PILL | Emergency contraception available to students

take an emergency contraception that contains estrogen in addition to progesterone, Blank said. There are no long-term effects of taking Plan B, and it has no effect on existing pregnancies.

"I don't think that most students realize that we have it," she said. "A lot of boyfriends know we have it and call or come in with their girlfriends."

It is difficult to gauge how many students use emergency contraception because there is no way of knowing if students are going somewhere else to receive medication.

Lafene first began providing an emergency contraceptive pill three years ago. The mechanics of how the pill actually works haven't been determined, she said, but the consensus of the medical community is that it prevents ovulation.

The Riley County Health Department also offers emergency contraception, said Kathy Dickey, clinic supervisor at the health department. The health department doesn't use a prepackaged emergency contraceptive, but administers birth control in higher doses to achieve the same purpose. This is mainly because of cost constraints at the department.

Nausea is slightly more common with this method and patients are given an additional dose to take if the first dose is not absorbed, she said. The medication is taken similarly to Plan B, an initial dose and another 12 hours later.

Education is a big part of administering the medication, Dickey said.

"We don't want people using it as birth control," she said.

JOBS | Flexibility, research key for new job seekers

company forever, they don't want to get laid off their third month on the job."

Employer research, then, is important. Mike Sexton, manager of the job service at the Manhattan Workforce Center, said interviewees need to understand a company's financial and employment situation.

Although older workers might be staying in the market, he said this shouldn't serve as an excuse. There are opportunities out there, but he said the job seeker must make the sell.

"An interview is the purest form of salesmanship," he said. "They have to convince that employer that they are an asset."

Right now, the best jobs, Morgan said, are in healthcare and Federal employment – both of which can be attributed to an aging society. In the next five years, about half of the government workforce will retire, and health-care providers, especially registered nurses, are in demand.

But that doesn't mean students who aren't interested in these fields need to change their outlooks, majors or replan their futures. It might just take a little revamping to get the job one desires.

While money, reputation of a company, the day-to-day work environment and opportunities for growth all go in to choosing a job, Morgan said location has become one of the most important factors for graduates to consider.

Large metropolitan cities might not be the best choice for many graduates. Morgan said she hasn't heard of any large cities that are doing well in the job market.

"People say, 'I can't go back and live near my home,'" she said. "But, you think about the number of organizations that are small and you may have never heard of. There are a lot of places that people don't think about. It doesn't all have to happen in the city."

But even in tough economic times, Bill Layes, chief of labor market information at the Kansas Department of Human Resources, said location should be a decision based on individual preference. He said money might be of concern for many students when they graduate, but individual factors differ.

"Do you like the fast-paced lifestyle Wall Street would offer?" he said. "Or the security of a small Midwestern town?

"You may have to accept a lower wage to get what you want," he said. "But get experience. Don't reside solely on wages as an indication of success."

There also can be misconceptions when entering the job market. The cost of living when relocating and benefit packages should be considered and negotiated, Morgan said.

Sexton said students should already know what benefits employers are offering before taking part in an interview. He said people must critically weigh benefits and salary against all possible employers.

The job search, too, should not be easy, Morgan said. It takes researching employers, understanding the market and networking to capture a job.

She said students should not just search for jobs on the Internet and send out résumés – it also takes use of the telephone and personal communications. Students should be willing to try different approaches and not make the same mistakes repeatedly.

"The productive work is the hard work," she said. "It's riskier – there's more personal rejection on the line – but you can build networks. It's part of being a professional."

NOTIFICATION | Other issues top Bosco's list

associate vice president and dean of student life.

Bosco said K-State officials have been cautious about not going beyond K-State's current policy of notifying parents on a case-by-case basis.

"We're monitoring what other schools are doing," he said. "We could change the way we're doing this in the future, but I personally have a ways to go before we reach that point."

A part of the challenge of implementing a formal parental notification policy is a lack of resources, Bosco said.

"To be able to institute a policy of this magnitude takes at least one staff member's time to make sure the policy is implemented in an appropriate and fair way," he said. "Most schools have a staff of three or four times the number we have in student life here."

Bosco said there are other things he's more concerned with than parental notification.

"Some colleges have done a good job with it, but they have a bigger staff than we do, and I have other fish to fry," he said.

IDENTITY | Officials advise protecting ID numbers

confidentiality with customer information," he said.

Dembkowski said the bank also educates customers about how to avoid identity theft.

"You think you have a foolproof plan. Somebody will find a way around it," he said.

Dembkowski said he advises customers not to use credit cards or share account information over the phone or on the Internet, to keep personal identification numbers private and to review closely monthly statements. If unauthorized transactions appear, the customer should notify the bank immediately, he said.

Immediate notification also is important in reporting lost or stolen student identification cards, said Craig Johnson, manager for the student ID center.

Most IDs have very little account information tied to them, but could be used by someone else on campus at places such as Hale Library or Lafene Health Center, he said.

As soon as students report lost or stolen IDs, the center can deactivate account information and scanning privileges, he said.

But ID cards provide more visible information. The student ID number is clearly visible on the card's front, which is usually the card owner's Social Security number.

Although some students choose not to use their Social Security numbers as student ID numbers, the majority of students attending K-State do, associate registrar Gunile DeVault said.

Students can request to use an assigned number instead, but few students do, because keeping a Social Security number confidential could be nearly impossible, she said.

"Every office you go to, from the medical profession to Wal-Mart, asks for that number," she said. "Probably, universities are more conscious of keeping that a hidden number than most of the businesses that most students deal with."

Students receiving financial aid or employed by the state have to use their Social Security numbers for business, DeVault said.

"It's a law," she said. "Trying not to use that runs into complications."

Student ID numbers are used as identifiers in lists, DeVault said.

Some departments use software that requires the Office of the Registrar to provide ID numbers, but teachers don't always understand how important it is to safeguard the information.

"We're always struggling with trying to get professors and GTAs to not post grades," she said.

Although professors are not supposed to post the number publicly, DeVault said she often walks through buildings and sees grades posted, sometimes with not only Social Security numbers, but also students' names.

"We ask them not to, and they usually stop," she said. "A lot of them are unaware that that is a concern."

DeVault said K-State operates under the Family Educational Rights and Privacy Act and tries to keep students' information private, unless a special situation warrants releasing the information, such as departments requesting the information to identify students in software programs.

DeVault said many identity thieves acquire personal information by digging through trash. Paper shredders could help make information like names and account information more difficult to acquire.

"We're probably a careless society," she said. "Better education is what we all need."

Cities, counties lose out

Riley County officials scramble to pick up slack

By April Middleton
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It is a budget nightmare.

Local government officials woke up to find themselves with almost $1 million less revenue than they had budgeted.

The shortfall is the result of emergency budget cuts made by Gov. Bill Graves last week.

Graves canceled $48 million in payments due to local governments from state sharing programs. The cuts, Graves said, will help the state with its own budget problems.

For Riley County, that means a loss of $953,896, which it already had budgeted to use through June 30, 2003.

"It's a pretty big effect," Eileen King, Riley County treasurer, said. "Our revenue for next year is about $17 million – comes to about 6 percent of our revenue."

Local governments had anticipated cuts, but King said there was no way of knowing how drastic the cuts would be.

"I thought they would cut those payments in half, but never would have dreamed that they would eliminate it all," she said. "So I guess our worst nightmare came true."

King said local governments across Kansas are trying to figure out how to make up for the lost revenue.

The real dilemma of the situation, Diane Stoddard, assistant city manager, said, is that the property tax levy already has been set, which means there is no way for the county to increase its revenue.

The shortfall will have to be made up by cutting expenses, she said.

"What we need to do is look at cuts and places those cuts can come from," Stoddard said. "We haven't made any decisions to where those cuts will come from as of yet. We are still working on that."

The county is also looking to decide where cuts can be made.

King said the budget committee prepared recommendations to take to county commissioners, but no decisions have been made.

One thing that is sure, however, she said, is that the almost $200,000 the county is short for the 2002 calender year will be taken out of carryover funds.

"We only have a few weeks of this year left," King said. "Since the announcement was made this late, there just isn't a way to find that many places to cut that quickly."

King said the budget committee had several goals when looking for ways to absorb the costs.

First, the committee wants to find ways other than layoffs or salary reductions to cover the shortfall, preserve funds for roads and bridges, and fund the essential roles of government.

Commissioners, King said, will have the final say on what they consider those essential roles to be.

The committee has recommended all out-of-state travel be eliminated and funding to several agencies be cut, some by as much as 50 percent. Some of those agencies that were included in the recommendation are Pawnee Mental Health, the health department, Big Lakes Developmental Center and law enforcement.

King said realizing that cuts have to be made is the easy part. Deciding where to cut is the difficult part.

"It's easy to sit in an office and say 'Start cutting,'" King

DRESSING UP

Denise Bieberstein, Manhattan resident, picks up a pair of pliers before hanging greenery outside the Short home at 3624 Anderson Ave., Thursday afternoon. Bieberstein, a friend of the family, has been helping the Shorts decorate in preparation for the Friends of McCain Homes Tour, from 8:30 a.m. to 4 p.m. Saturday.

Holiday decorations featured in local homes tour

By Sarah Rice
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

For the last two weeks, Barbara Gatewood has been finding places for more than 450 angels and six Christmas trees as she decorates her home in anticipation of Saturday's McCain Homes Tour.

The Gatewood home is one of seven stops on the tour of decorated homes, sponsored by Friends of McCain to raise money for McCain programming. Tour participants will have a chance to walk through homes displaying unique holiday decorations, along with distinct architecture and history. The homes will be open from 8:30 a.m. to 4:30 p.m. Saturday.

Gatewood's home will be displaying the Ruth Hoeflin angel collection, which is owned by the College of Human Ecology. Hoeflin is a former dean of the College of Human Ecology who collected more than 1,225 angels from around the world.

"We have been decorating for about two weeks, but we started planning at the beginning of the fall semester," Gatewood said. "I had to get special permission to display the angels."

In addition to her traditional holiday decorating, Gatewood has six Christmas trees on display.

"We have more trees than usual," she said. "There is one tree with our ornaments, but there are three trees that are totally decorated with angels."

While Gatewood decorated for two weeks, it only took Barbara Nelson two days to get her 800-square-foot loft, the newest stop on the tour, ready for display. Nelson and her husband, Jay, live in a loft connected to the Strecker-Nelson Art Gallery on Poyntz Avenue.

Her biggest challenge, she said, was keeping her decorations in proportion with the small space with which she had to work.

A roll of ribbon sits on the ground while Whitney Short, manhattan resident holds up the top half next to a tree outside her home to see if it matches. The Short home will be on display as part of the Friends of McCain Home

"We brought in the natural element," Nelson said. "We have greens and wreaths. This place doesn't have a yard, it doesn't have trees.

"Keeping things in scale is really limiting. It is easy to get carried away with a lot of stuff and we've kept it minimal in a way so as not to overpower the space."

The oldest home on the tour, owned by Steve and Whitney Short, was built in 1857 and was recently renovated. The Shorts added an addition to the back of the home and reconstructed the existing structure. It was Manhattan's first post office and the Shorts have tried to recreate the original 1850s style of decorating.

Another stop on the tour is the Berland home in the Sharingbrook neighborhood. Deloris Berland said tour participants will notice the architecture of her home more than anything else.

Berland also will be displaying a special collection – Santa figures sculpted and painted by Great Bend artist, Loretta Miller. Miller hand sculpts the Santas, paints all the faces and sews the clothing.

Nelson said the tour offers not only a chance to support McCain and get ideas for Christmas decorating, but also an opportunity to discover the uniqueness of these Manhattan homes.

"It affords people an opportunity to see some of these special homes, and they are special for some reason," she said. "They are old like the Shorts' or really new like mine. Each of the homes has something unique that distinguishes it and the people who live in those homes have tried to make it that way."

The McCain Tour of Homes

When: 8:30 a.m. to 4:30 p.m. Saturday
Tickets: $15 in advance at McCain Auditorium, $32-6428, or at any of the homes on the tour.

Registrar retires after 37 years; replacement to begin soon

By James Hurla
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

After two degrees and 37 years of employment, Registrar Don Foster is stepping down from his position. His replacement, Monty Nielsen, will take over the position after winter break.

The university registrar is responsible for managing official records and information systems at K-State, Vice President for Institutional Advancement Pat Bosco said.

Foster has overseen the implementation and maintenance of such programs as K-State Online, KATS, Student Information Systems and DARS, Bosco said.

"Very few people at K-State have shepherded as many changes as Don has in the last 25 years," Bosco said.

Foster, who received his bachelor's and master's degrees from K-State and has been the university registrar since 1981, will enter a phased retirement starting in the spring semester.

He said he plans to continue working part-time on a project to replace financial and student systems. The project, LASER, is expected to take about three years to complete.

"I am retiring age," he said. "I felt that within this project, there was an opportunity for me to contribute to the university and stay involved."

Reception

A retirement reception for Registrar Don Foster will be open to the public.
When: 3 to 5 p.m. Wednesday, Dec. 18
Where: Great Room of the K-State Alumni Center.

Karen Mikols | COLLEGIAN

Don Foster is retiring from his full-time position as the registrar at K-State. He will still work part-time on special projects.

Foster said he plans to spend his free time traveling and visiting his children, who are spread out from Hawaii to Florida. He also plans to devote more time to volunteering for Gideon's International, an organization he has been involved with since 1991.

CAMPUS CONNECTION

Nicole Donnert | COLLEGIAN
Many students use Varney's Book Store to buy and sell textbooks. But others have taken the book exchange process into their own hands, buying and selling from friends.

Students trade textbooks

By Pete Elsasser
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Kim Freed hates it when she can't sell back her textbooks, and she doesn't really know what to do with them.

"I guess I could just use them for a doorstop," Freed, sophomore in kinesiology, said.

That's why Freed likes to sell her used textbooks to friends. She said she's sold algebra and biology textbooks to friends for more money than if she had returned them to the bookstore.

"It's a win-win situation," Freed said. "The person buying the books can get them cheaper, and the person selling them makes more money, too."

John Kohrs, Beta Sigma Psi fraternity president, said his fraternity has developed an informal policy where the members make lists of textbooks with prices. He said members pass around lists during meetings and post information in the lobby.

"Most people will take just about anything," he said. "They compare what classes and what books they need and come up with a fair price. It's a good way to cut costs because we'll help each other out with prices."

Katie Rader, sophomore in marketing, said she also gets tired of buying all new textbooks every semester. She said it would just be easier if she could get old copies from friends, instead of paying the maximum price. Rader said she bought a psychology book from a friend last semester because she didn't want to pay $60.

"I only had to pay my friend $40," she said. "It was a lot cheaper, and it worked out for her, too, because she would have gotten less if she sold it back."

Rader said that buying a book from a friend is not as much of a hassle. She said even planning ahead when ordering books doesn't always pay off.

"Sometimes it seems like even if you get your order in a month early, you're bound to get new books, and those are expensive," she said. "It's just a better deal to buy from a friend."

A closer look

Many of the issues at K-State also affect some of America's other universities. Campus Connection offers a side-by-side view at how some of them are addressed here and at other schools.

Marquette begins exchange

By Lisa Petersen
THE MARQUETTE TRIBUNE

MILWAUKEE – An alternate means for buying and selling textbooks will be available for students in their search for deals in the new semester.

An online textbook exchange is available on the Marquette University Student Government Web site, www.mu.edu/musg. This service offers students a chance to deal directly with other students in the purchase and sale of textbooks.

The exchange, called Dogears, became available after Columbia University's student government created it, MUSG President Lawrence Baylis said.

A Marquette e-mail address is required for registration, Baylis said. After registration, an e-mail will be sent to the student's Marquette account. Students then click on a link through the e-mail to access the service and finish registration.

To post books for sale, students enter the ISBN number found inside the book – the author, title, edition and list price will automatically be entered.

"This will give the power back to students for book purchasing," sophomore Nicole Garland, MUSG multimedia director, said.

The Web site also has other sections, including a marketplace for students to post classifieds advertising almost anything, a course guide and a chat board to feature events happening on campus, Baylis said.

Quotable | Words worth repeating

"We're not interested in hide-and-seek inside Iraq. The only question is ... will this man disarm?"
President Bush, on how he remains skeptical about Saddam Hussein's intentions.

"When people feel uncertain, they'd rather have somebody that's strong and wrong than somebody who's weak and right."
Former President Clinton, on the Democrats' loss in midterm elections.

"I've almost become numb. When I see a monkey-skull ashtray I say, 'Oh, another monkey-skull ashtray.'"
U.S. Fish and Wildlife inspection officer Chris Andrews, who looks for illegal wildlife smugglers at Ted Stevens Anchorage International Airport.

said. "but when you are affecting so many people's lives, it is difficult."

Johnette Mueller, budget and finance officer, said those funds are not expected to be reinstated next year, either.

"We are anticipating that we won't get these funds for the next couple of years," Mueller said. "We are trying to plan accordingly."

The League of Kansas Municipalities and the Kansas Association of Counties are considering a lawsuit challenging the state's right to withhold money from the cities and counties.

The LKM, which represents 656 Kansas cities, and KAC, which represents 104 of the 105 Kansas counties, are considering the lawsuit based on a 1982 Kansas attorney general's opinion that the state is required to forward the money to local governments.

The two groups are meeting Dec. 12 in Topeka to make a decision on what the appropriate next steps are, said Sandy Jacquot, director of law and legal council for LKM.

"The cities are worried," she said. "We are talking about a huge amount of money to take from local governments who have no way to medicate the loss of revenue. They feel powerless."

FOSTER | Retiree plans to travel, stay involved with university projects

"He's a very caring, approachable person," associate registrar Gunile DeVault said, "with vast knowledge about the university because of his extensive time here."

Nielsen, assistant to the vice chancellor for student affairs and assistant dean of the College of Letters and Science, student academic affairs, at the University of Wisconsin-Madison, will replace Foster.

Prior to this position, Nielsen was the university registrar at the University of Wisconsin-Madison from 1998-2002, and at Washington State University from 1993-98.

He was associate registrar and director of admissions and records at the University of North Dakota from 1982-85.

A retirement reception for Foster will be from 3 to 5 p.m. Wednesday, Dec. 18, in the Great Room of the K-State Alumni Center.

"(Foster) has orchestrated many positive changes to the university climate that have made K-State a friendly, responsible community for students, faculty, advisers and administrators," Bosco said.

TO THE POINT

Friends, food help to mend broken hearts

Breaking up is hard to do, but we've compiled our favorite ways to get over lost love.

Amber Koehn: A few close friends, some very fattening snacks and the movie "Sleepless in Seattle."

Paul Restivo: Humping inanimate objects works really well.

Sean Purcell: It obviously wasn't meant to be, so find someone who loves you enough not to break up with you.

JJ Duncan: Go to Aggieville, get drunk, hit on everything that moves.

April Middleton: All you need is good friends, ice cream and lots of beer.

Dan Smith: Sit on the toilet with a beer and talk to your roommate about it while he's taking a bath.

Edie Hall: Buy one of those big exercise balls, but don't use it to exercise. Just lie on it and pretend you are flying.

Dana Strongin: Long runs, even longer naps, chocolate, beer or any combination of the four.

Sarah Rice: Put all your mementos in a box and get it out of sight. Then, take a bath – in a pool of your own tears.

Kecia Seyb: Cry – a lot – and think about that person who must be waiting for you somewhere in the world.

To the point is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

Don't be fooled by phony miracle cures; true healing comes from within

KATHRYN HOLLINGSWORTH

Exploitation is an accepted part of American life.

We recognize the importance of free enterprise, and press onward toward our ideal of the American dream. We allow ourselves to be exploited, while creating a balance of power, by appealing for corporate responsibility and challenging our corporate heads to give back to the community.

However, there are institutions that escape the eye of public scrutiny and exploit those who are desperate and weak.

Those who seek gain by raping the human soul are not worthy of the air they breathe.

Consumerism is a way of life, and corporations spend billions of dollars on marketing strategies, and work to understand the personalities and desires of the client with the checkbook.

When Wal-Mart offers to give 3 cents of every purchase to a Ronald McDonald house, consumers feel they are contributing to society. As a warm glow settles within their hearts, another large corporation gleams success from an intrinsic desire of human nature to help those in need.

We lowly humans refer to our purchase as an act of giving. Corporate spin doctors refer to it as "cause-related marketing." The gratification you associate with being charitable promotes a company's social image and transforms into a satisfaction with the company.

It's a win-win situation. Corporations utilize philanthropy for gain. Long live capitalism.

The real slime are those who shroud themselves in a facade of true compassion. Those who really deserve to rot in hell are the bottom-feeders who exploit the weak and their faith in a higher power.

Desperation is followed by exploitation.

Have you ever heard of miracle spring water?

This amazing discovery was brought to my attention while aimlessly flipping through channels on a boring night. It was amazing. People were walking after being confined to a wheelchair for 20 years. People ridden with back pain were immediately healed.

I thought Jesus himself had come back to earth to heal the afflicted. But instead, it was some smooth-talking guy with a charismatic demeanor in an outrageously expensive suit.

One day, Pastor Scum was contemplating life and thought: "Hmmm ... Jesus gives his life for sins, nailed to the cross. There must be some way I can exploit him."

Pastor Vile, who was "chosen" by God to heal people, then gave his toll-free number at the bottom of the screen for ordering his "free" miracle spring water.

Assured that Pastor Bottom-feeder wasn't healing people out of the goodness of his heart, I candidly dialed his hotline. Within seconds, I was guided through a recording and invited to record my name, phone number and address to receive my "free" miracle spring water ... and Pastor Wretched's book.

During the pastor's healing ceremony, he never asked for money or mentioned the book he was selling. He simply preyed upon the weak, oppressed people desperately searching for a cure to their ailments.

People were crying and wailing wanting to believe in his magic cure, and flocking to the phone lines like sheep into a wolf's den.

There is a price for everything, and sometimes you pay that price to have a nice, new sweater. But there are others who pay the price for useless water.

Life has hardships, and nothing is going to erase pain or suffering from human existence. There is no magic pill that will lose 20 pounds for you and keep it off. No faith-healer's magic spring water and pompous book are going to solve your spiritual and physical trials.

Recognizing the will power and desire within ourselves to improve our lives is the gateway to avoiding exploitation.

ANDREW LAWSON

Well, we've been back a week.

If you're like me, you've probably been tempted to just go through the motions until finals.

The days are gray, and this is the time of the year when it is most difficult to drag yourself out of a comfortable bed and trudge through the bitter cold to a dreary class.

And that's just the mental weariness dragging you down.

If you're especially unlucky, then a perpetual cold/flu plague is making you miserable every waking second.

I know the feeling because I'm suffering, too.

Thanksgiving gives us an opportunity to recharge, but like all good things, it must come to an end. How do you maintain the intensity during the horribly misnamed "dead week" into a period of stressful finals and projects?

I think the most important thing you can do is to simply force yourself to excel in spite of adversity. All it takes is a simple attitude adjustment.

When the alarm clock goes off, harshly yanking the bliss of sleep away, don't hit the "snooze" button in a vain attempt to cling to lost dreams. Instead, jump out of bed determined to treat the day as a challenge to be overcome, not a trial to be endured.

Project due in three days? Buckle down and finish it in two, even if it means sacrificing quality time with your Playstation 2.

Procrastination only perpetuates feelings of helplessness; it's a self-defeating prophecy. On the other hand, taking a proactive stance and finishing tasks early will lift the weight of stress off your back.

One of the single most crucial things you can do to improve your attitude is to immerse yourself in the community.

That can mean many different approaches for different people. It may be as simple as leaving your room every now and then to take a walk on campus. When you are around other people, it's harder to feel sorry for yourself.

Or you might prefer to get involved in a new activity or group, especially since many groups you already participate in may be winding down.

Volunteering is a great way to stave off the blues. After all, Christmas is drawing near and there are endless opportunities to help others more needy than yourself.

Charity is rewarding in and of itself as well as useful in keeping things in perspective – no matter how bad you think you have it, others are probably worse off. And by helping them, you also help yourself.

Most of all, though, you should surround yourself with friends and family, who compose a natural support group when you're miserable.

Granted, many of us cannot be with family until school is over, but your loved ones don't have to be there in person to help you through hard times. Phone calls, e-mails, letters or even just a picture can brighten a day.

Ultimately, there is no one particular right answer for what ails you. I could go on with suggestions, but it's time for me take some of my own advice and move on to another project.

Women intent on keeping focus

Early blowouts aren't making Wildcats cocky

Cats in action

#7 K-State (6-1) vs. Middle Tennessee State (2-1)
When: 4:30 p.m. today
Where: Bramlage Coliseum (13,340)
What: First round of the Commerce Bank Wildcat Classic

By Sean Purcell
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Blowouts can not only be tough to watch, they can be tough to play as well.

That's what the women's basketball team is going through.

Coming off a 78-point working of Arkansas-Pine Bluff on Monday, the Cats enter the Commerce Bank Wildcat Classic, a tournament not known for its stellar competition.

Teams like Middle Tennessee State, UW-Milwaukee and Weber State will enter Bramlage Coliseum with hopes of upsetting the seventh-ranked Cats.

"I really don't pay attention to that stuff," forward Kendra Wecker said. "We just want to go out and execute and run our plays like we need to and defend at the level we need to – and just have a good time playing at home in front of our fans and in our own tournament."

So how can K-State benefit from rolling over a team by 50 points or more?

The answer is simple, Coach Deb Patterson said. A lot.

"I think in the basketball games at this point, we need to raise the standard of how we are approaching every single possession," she said. "We're putting challenges on the board relative to who we want to be during segments of the game, and trying to meet those challenges, as well as the challenges our opponents present in actual game situations.

"So this is a time for us to grow and improve while we are playing quality opponents but at the same time where we need to get better and add a little more and refine who we are."

Patterson said this is a good stretch for the Cats, especially after coming off tough games against No. 14 Penn State and No. 7 Stanford.

Now the team can focus a little more on the mental approach, rather than what the other team is presenting them.

Patterson said mental focus can be tested when you are up by a large margin.

Games tend to get sloppy, she said.

"I was real proud of the fact that our basketball team approached that game possession by possession, inrespective of score." Patterson said. "I think in games where the score begins to get out of reach, players try to do too much, you start to see a lot of turnovers and flashy plays that aren't going to carry over into more highly competitive situations.

"And I thought we did a good job of remaining true to the priorities we brought to the floor."

K-State will play Middle Tennessee State at 4:30 p.m. today.

If the Cats win, they will play the winner of UW-Milwaukee versus Weber State game at 4:30 p.m. Saturday. If they lose, the Wildcats will play at 2:30 p.m. Saturday.

Sophomore guard Megan Mahoney said the team will not only focus on the mental side of the game, but on establishing consistency with a number of different lineups.

"In several games this year, the bench has had some good minutes," she said. "That is going to be really quality for us down the road in case there is foul trouble, or whatever the case is. Hopefully, they will be able to step up."

Cats' fingers crossed

K-State hoping for best-case bowl scenario

Bowl selection show
When: 2:30 p.m. Sunday on ABC
What's on the line: If Washington State loses, K-State has shot at a bid to the Orange Bowl.

By Joel Reichenberger
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Twelve games, 48 quarters, 720 minutes, 548 points and K-State's bowl future may hinge on a game 1,500 miles away on the Pacific coast.

On Wednesday, Athletic Director Tim Weiser said there are four bowl games K-State is seriously being considered for – the most prestigious of these being one of the four Bowl Championship Series games, the Orange Bowl, which will be played on Jan. 2 in Miami, Fla. But, he said, K-State would need some help from UCLA on Saturday.

"We've said all along we know a large part of our chance (for the Orange Bowl) is tied to the Washington State, UCLA game," he said.

If Washington State wins, it will lock up the Pac-10 championship. Then USC, ranked No. 4 in Monday's BCS poll, will finish No. 2 in the Pac-10 and take an at-large bid to the BCS. But if Washington State loses, USC will take the Pac-10 title, the automatic BCS bid that accompanies it, and their at-large bid would be open, possibly for K-State.

In hopes to help K-State's chances for the last at-large bid, Weiser, President Jon Wefald and Coach Bill Snyder met with the Orange Bowl committee Tuesday.

Weiser said he was confident the Orange Bowl had a realistic interest in K-State.

"That was one of the things we had hoped to find out – just their level on interest," Weiser said. "Based on the conversation, it was obvious there was sincere interest."

He said he didn't need to point out one of K-State's best resources – the enthusiastic fans. Based on the fan support K-State normally attracts at bowl games, Weiser guaranteed the Orange Bowl that K-State would sell 25,000 tickets. But he said the bowl executives were already well aware of the purple passion.

"They remarked on their bowl (Web) site that Kansas State was the highest ranked option of teams as it relates to fan interest," Weiser said. "Of course, that does not surprise us because we know how passionate our fans are."

The site, www.orangebowl.org, features a poll where users select which teams play in the bowl game. As of Thursday afternoon, K-State led the pack with 96 percent of the 6,250 votes.

If Washington State wins, things get more complicated.

The next possible bowl is the Jan. 1 Cotton Bowl in Dallas. Weiser said Texas will likely fill that spot.

After that is the Holiday Bowl in San Diego, Calif. K-State's chances (Dec. 27 in San Diego, Calif.) likely will depend on Saturday night's Big 12 Championship game between Oklahoma and Colorado. If Oklahoma loses, it likely will beat out K-State for the Holiday Bowl berth, as the Sooners never have played there before.

K-State would then head to San Antonio, Texas for the Alamo Bowl on Dec. 28.

On Saturday, K-State will finally find out where it will spend its holidays. The Washington State vs. UCLA game airs at 2:30 p.m. on ABC. The Oklahoma vs. Colorado game is also on ABC at 7 p.m.

NCAA VOLLEYBALL TOURNAMENT

Go Time

Junior co-captain Laura Downey-Wallace and Coach Suzie Fritz are ready for the first two rounds of the NCAA tournament, which begins today at Ahearn Field House. K-State enters the tournament with a 20-8 season record.

Ahearn, Wildcats ready for NCAA Tournament

By Sean Purcell
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Today is the start of a whole new volleyball season, junior middle blocker Lauren Goehring said.

Records are now out the window. Who beat whom? It doesn't matter.

It's tournament time.

K-State (20-8) will play host to the first two rounds of the NCAA tournament, starting today, when it plays Michigan (16-14) at Ahearn Field House.

"It's a completely new season for everybody," Goehring said. "The best team could lose the first round. It typically doesn't happen, but anything can happen.

"It's exciting to play new and different teams. And to be home a couple more times is always nice."

The Cats learned they would be at home after the Tournament Selection Committee announced the sites Sunday.

This is the second year in a row K-State has been chosen to be host to the first and second rounds.

"To be able to host is always a great thing," sophomore setter Gabby Guerre said. "I'm not complaining."

After being given the opportunity to be a host team, the Wildcats have to hold up their end of the deal. Advancing to the Sweet 16 is the goal, outside hitter Cari Jensen said.

First on the bill is Michigan, a team the Cats saw last year and in the spring this season.

The Wolverines have a strong one-two punch with outside hitter Jennifer Gandolph and middle blocker Erin Moore.

Lindsey Bauman | COLLEGIAN
Junior libero Laura Downey-Wallace passes during K-State's win against Baylor Nov. 9 at Ahearn Field House. The Cats meet Michigan today in the first round of NCAA Tournament play.

Gandolph leads the team in kills, averaging 3.75 per game, while Moore is second on the team in blocks (1.07 per contest).

Jensen said that even though the team has seen what Michigan can do both offensively and defensively, it is up to K-State to execute their own game plan because that should be enough to win.

"I think that's how it is, no matter who you play, whether it's in a tournament or in conference," Jensen said. "You want to play your game so that they have to change to you and not you play to change for them."

Should K-State win, it will more than likely face 12th-seeded Washington State in the second round.

The Cougars, of the Pac-10 Conference, scored quality wins over Stanford (the Pacific region's No. 1 seed) and UCLA.

Washington State also took a game from Southern California, the tournament's No. 1 seed.

But Coach Suzie Fritz said the team isn't worried about the second round, or who they might play. All that matters, she said, is that the Cats do the things needed to be successful.

"Hopefully, your season has prepared you for the NCAA tournament," she said. "If you're not good now, or not prepared now, you're not going to be prepared on Friday or Saturday.

"I don't think it's one all of a sudden magical moment once you get into the NCAA's."

Football | Newman named finalist for Thorpe Award

Senior Terence Newman has been named one of three finalists for the Jim Thorpe Award. The winner will be announced Dec. 12 as part of ESPN's College Football Awards show live from Orlando, Fla.

Newman, from Salina, Kan., joined Troy Polamalu of USC and Mike Doss of Ohio State as finalists for the Thorpe Award, given annually to the top college defensive back in the nation. The field of three was selected from a group of 14 semifinalists that were announced in late November.

Chris Canty was the last Wildcat to be named a finalist for the Thorpe Award, being one of the final three in both 1995 and 1996. K-State has had players among semifinalists for the Thorpe Award four times since 1993 (Jaime Mendez, 1993; Canty, 1995 and 1996; Newman, 2001).

MLB | Benes retires

Andy Benes, whose 1.86 ERA during last season's second half for the St. Louis Cardinals led National League starters, made his retirement official Thursday.

Benes, who's long hinted he would like to leave the game on his own terms, notified general manager Walt Jocketty during a roughly hour-long meeting, Cardinals spokesman Brian Bartow said.

Benes, whose scheduled meeting Wednesday with Jocketty was pushed back a day because of an area snowstorm, declined to publicly talk about the retirement.

NCAA | Franchione named new coach of Texas A&M

Dennis Franchione didn't have much to say about becoming the new football coach at Texas A&M.

Franchione landed in a private jet Thursday and was whisked into an awaiting car for a short ride to the A&M campus.

Erle Nye, chairman of the Texas A&M board of regents, confirmed Franchione had agreed to a deal with the Aggies to replace R.C. Slocum, fired Monday by president Robert Gates after a 6-6 finish this season and a 50-20 loss to Texas.

McCain freezes over

The St. Petersburg State Ice Ballet will be performing in McCain on Sunday, and that means they will need ice to perform. Fortunately, the troupe has a portable ice rink it installs at sites where it is needed.

Kyle McGuffin, technical director for McCain, will be heading a work crew that will help install the ice rink on McCain's stage. The process takes more than 24 hours and constant attention to create a smooth surface for the performances.

This is a rough timeline that the workers will have to follow in order to have an ice surface presentable for the world class skaters.

Saturday

8 a.m.
Workers arrive and lay down the portable 40 foot by 36 foot rink on the stage. The rink has several cooling tubes that are attached to outside pumps that pump in coolant to freeze the ice.

Noon
Four tons of chipped ice are hauled in and spread on the rink as a base. The pumps are turned on to start the freezing process. Hot water is sprayed on the ice and is allowed to freeze.

afternoon
After the base is laid, the ice is scraped and more water is sprayed on the ice and allowed to freeze. For every hour for at least 12 hours, this process is repeated. The repetition of this process will create a smooth surface.

Sunday

7 a.m.
The ice should now be three to four inches thick and smooth enough to skate on. The trucks carrying scenery will arrive and workers will have to set up the hand-painted backdrops.

9 to 10 p.m.
The second show of Sleeping Beauty is over and workers tear down the set and put the pieces in the trucks for the next show.

11 p.m.
Workers start chipping the ice away with tools such as sledge hammers. Wheelbarrow after wheelbarrow of ice is hauled out and disposed of.

1 to 2 a.m.
By now the workers should have the ice hauled off and the rink should be loaded, the job is done. The rink will be hauled off for the troupe's next performance.

Russians give fairy tale performance

J. Scott Bowman
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Trained Russians will be invading the K-State campus Sunday, armed with sharp skates and ice-skating skills.

The St. Petersburg State Ice Ballet will be performing "The Sleeping Beauty" on Sunday in McCain Auditorium.

The decision was easy to invite the troupe to skate at McCain, said Thom Jackson, marketing and development officer for McCain.

"When we look for events to host, we look at what is going to be in the area," Jackson said.

"Instead of having a typical performance like the Nutcracker or something, we thought an ice ballet would be nice.

It's not something we can get all the time, and this is a good one for anyone who likes fairy tales."

The troupe has traveled throughout the United States for the past eight years. It has performed several different acts, including "Swan Lake" and "Romeo and Juliet," said John Sullivan, tour manager for the Park Avenue Theatrical Group.

"The shows they put on are incredible," Sullivan said. "They have wonderful skaters performing Russian ballets on ice.

It's a unique experience because the Russians are so classically trained and disciplined. And the choreography is beautiful."

A recurring problem a traveling ice ballet encounters is the ability to skate on ice where ice isn't always available.

Luckily, the troupe has a traveling ice rink that is installed when needed, Sullivan said.

Local help normally is used to help put in the ice, and that is where Kyle McGuffin, technical director for McCain, steps in to help.

"Putting in a temporary ice rink isn't something we do every day," McGuffin said. "There was one that was put in back in 1996, but it's a process that is very labor-intensive and time-consuming."

The spectacle is worth the trouble, though, Sullivan said. He said the professional ballet troupe has traveled to nearly every state. Also, he said the costumes are wonderful and scenery is all hand-painted.

"It's a show that is appealing to all ages," Sullivan said. "We have kids that come to matinees, and the grandparents they come with enjoy it just as much.

"It's a great show to watch. The Russians can do anything. They perform a classical form that we don't see here as much in this country," he said, "so it's something special to go out and see."

Extended format Magic tournament coming to Manhattan

Local players enjoy home advantage for first time since 1998

By JJ Duncan
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

For the first time since 1998, Magic: The Gathering, will have a competitive home in Manhattan.

An Extended-format Magic tournament will be Saturday to qualify for bys in Grand Prix New Orleans.

So for anyone who doesn't know the jargon, what does that mean?

First of all, Magic is a game played with collectible cards of five different colors, and the object is to reduce your opponent from 20 life points to 0.

The DCI is the organization that regulates rules, judging and errata for the game. The DCI has broken up the game of Magic into three primary types of constructed tournaments: Type I, Type II and Extended.

Second, why is it good for Manhattan Magic players that a tournament is in their hometown?

"If we get a good turnout, we'll try to move premiere DCI sanctioned events to Manhattan instead of having all of them in Kansas City," John Diesel, event organizer, said. "There is also less travel expense for Manhattan players if it's in town, and it offers an opportunity to younger kids who can't travel."

Diesel, ranked 12th in the state of Kansas, is responsible for bringing the tournament to Manhattan. The last time a tournament was in Manhattan was the gaming convention Kanzacon, in the K-State Student Union in 1998, Diesel said.

"We'd like to re-stimulate the public," he said. "We'd like to bring in all the people who used to play Magic, and the people who have played but not in a tournament environment.

They usually haven't played in tournaments because they have to go to Lincoln, Neb., or Oklahoma, or Kansas City, Kan., for an opportunity to play."

Connie Kissee, owner of Wildcat Cards, will be selling merchandise at the tournament. Kissee put together Kanzacon in 1998, and said she is excited to see Magic coming back to Manhattan because it is good for local players.

"The market has grown since that tournament," she said. "Business has picked up in Magic, and we'd like to get more people involved in it. There are some guys in Marlatt who play Magic, and some of them said they might be there. It's a good way to see how players from other areas come up with deck ideas."

Magic: The Gathering

- What: Magic Extended format Grand prix Trials tournament for New Orleans
- When : Registration is from 9 to 10 a.m. in the Union Ballroom. The tournament will begin at 10 a.m.

Performers make 'La Boheme' the most chahgeable show on Broadway

There are at least six different versions of "La Boheme" on Broadway.

Baz Luhrmann's new production of Puccini's opera features three different sets of lead actors and two sets of actors in supporting roles who perform on a rotating basis.

The unusual arrangement creates a show that has a different look and sound depending on which night you see it.

"We're all trying to do our own thing," said Wei Huang, one of the three actresses playing Mimi, the female lead.

"We have a similar structure to our performances, but lots of small details are different."

The singing and acting vary, but other aspects of the show change, too. Actors wear different costumes, individually tailored to their personalities.

The conductor alters the pace of the musical accompaniment depending on who is singing.

Variety was not Luhrmann's goal in casting the show with rotating players. It was simple necessity. Traditional opera houses schedule only a few performances over a period of several weeks to allow voices ample time to recover between shows.

Luhrmann's production, by contrast, will be running a typical Broadway schedule of eight performances a week. Not even the strongest opera voice could handle that workout.

Two-day program will celebrate New York and New Yorkers

The stories are by Mark Twain, Edith Wharton and other famous authors. The readers will include actresses Tammy Grimes and Anne Jackson and mystery writer Lawrence Block.

"A Celebration of New York and New Yorkers," public readings at the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church in Manhattan, will take place midday Thursday and Friday.

The two-day program will honor "the wit, humor, drama, energy, indomitable spirit and unique flavor of life in our great city," according to event sponsor TIPA (Toward International Peace Through the Arts), a nonprofit organization. Admission is free.

Dating dilemmas

What's a memorable breakup story you or someone you know has experienced?

Mary Glasgow
FRESHMAN IN APPAREL DESIGN

"We were arguing about a situation, and then I just dropped him off in the middle of the road."

Jacquee Jones
SENIOR IN EDUCATION

"I was with a guy for three years, and we never had sex. And he graduated to become a teacher, and then he winds up breaking up with me to date a senior in high school. No lie. No lie."

SENIOR IN ARCHITECTURAL ENGINEERING

"This one time, me and a friend, we decided to cut through the sexual tension and just to hook up and see what it's like. So after a night at the bars, which is always a good idea, we went back to his place. And in the middle of the night, I woke up and I had to go to the bathroom, but I had never been to his place before. And the lights were all turned out, and I ended up running into a wall and breaking my nose. And when he turned on all the lights, he looked at me and saw me crying and blood all over my face, and he was like, 'Oh, my God, what happened to you?' Needless to say, we've never hooked up again because it's too dangerous."

Jon Richardson
SENIOR IN BUSINESS MANAGEMENT

"I came home from the bars one night, and my girlfriend was there making out with a guy that I know. She didn't know I was there, but then she moved up to the sleeping dorms with the guy and they continued their session. And so the gentleman that I am, I crawled in bed with them and got my picture taken with them, and she hasn't spoken to me since."

SOPHOMORE IN ELEMENTARY EDUCATION

"He like took me aside and said, 'I'm sorry, I don't love you anymore, and I've been cheating on you.' So I had his class ring. I took his class ring, and I launched it in the cornfield, and a combine ate it."

Adam Higgins
SENIOR IN SECONDARY EDUCATION

"In elementary school, I broke up with my girlfriend for her best friend, but she turned me down. I think it might have been through a note."

Gage Zierlein
JUNIOR IN PRE-MED

"We went to a strip club and had a pretty good time. By the time [my friend] got back, he was pretty drunk. He called his girlfriend and told her what a good time he had, and she broke up with him."

Ray Stone
JUNIOR IN EDUCATION

"My girlfriend dumped me for another girl. It was my freshman year of high school — that was a culture shock. I thought everything was going fine, and then just one day ..."

Breaking up tough; mourning necessary

Honesty, assertiveness keys for ending relationships

By Kecia Seyb
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Perhaps you've loved.

And perhaps you know the hurt of a breakup, whether you've been the dumper or the one let go.

In college – this period when many find their mates, relationships are a big deal and knowing whether or not to stay with someone is important, especially since nearly one in two marriages end in divorce.

Sometimes, however, it may be difficult to know when you need to call a relationship quits. Most say that if you've tried to work through your problems and to communicate and things aren't improving, it's time to say good-bye.

Collegian's top 10 breakup songs

"I Will Survive" by Gloria Gaynor
"Your Cheatin' Heart" by Hank Williams Sr.
"End of the Road" by Boyz II Men
"You Oughtta Know" by Alanis Morisette
"Love Hurts" by Nazareth
"Somebody Kill Me" by Adam Sandler
"Breaking Up is Hard to Do" by Neil Sedaka
"Black" by Pearl Jam
"Nothing Compares to You" by Sinead O'Conner
"Yesterday" by the Beatles

A relationship is over "when you're not calling them because you want to – you're calling them to report," Terry Nicholas, senior in history, said.

No matter when it's over, breaking up is hard to do. It's even harder to do when one person decides it's time and the other person doesn't, said Tony Jurich, professor of marriage and family therapy. When breakups aren't mutual, dumpers give their partners three choices, he said.

"Choice number one is we remain in the relationship the way we've been, and I'm not willing to do that, so I'm taking that away," he said, hypothetically.

"The other two choices – in some way, we have some kind of a relationship, some kind of a friendship, but not boyfriend and girlfriend. And the third choice is we can't really stand being around each other without being intimate, so we just can't see each other because it's just too painful."

After one person takes away the first choice, Jurich said the other person may feel like his dreams have been taken away, which is sometimes worse than the actual absence of the person.

"They've started twirling their initials together. Once they're in your dreams, you start making dreams for each other," Jurich said. "If that comes to a crashing halt, it's the loss of your dreams."

To crash someone's dreams, or to break up with someone, people should be honest, upfront and assertive but not overemphasize the other's faults, said Dale Harris, graduate teaching assistant in the doctoral program for marriage and family therapy.

"I think you can overdo it, describing it too much," he said. "'You're not doing this. You're doing this wrong, and that bugs me.' And that's not really wrong – that's just different. When somebody breaks up with you, say, 'Is there something I can learn from this,' but just because he doesn't like that, doesn't mean it's wrong."

Nicholas said there is some breakup etiquette people should follow.

"I know e-mail is considered a bad way to do it," he said. "I have a friend – he told me he wanted to marry this girl. He went to check his e-mail, and she said, 'I think we should see other people.' I've never seen someone so bitter for six months."

Instead, Nicholas suggests letting the person down easily in a friendly environment.

"Take them someplace nice, someplace familiar, for two reasons," he said. "For one, it's easier to break it to them really nicely, and for two, they're not going to cause a big commotion."

After breakups, people need to mourn, Harris said.

"There's a natural grieving process anytime you have a loss," Harris said. "For deaths, we have funerals. For relationship breakups, we don't really have any socially determined way of dealing with that, so sometimes we don't know what to do."

Jurich said a person should allot a certain amount of time each day to mourn the person, looking through photos and listening to certain songs. Don't think about the person again until the next time. Continue to do this until you no longer need that mourning period, he said.

It takes people different amounts of time to mourn, and for Nicholas, he said his moving-on time period depends on the relationship.

"If I wasn't that close to her, I'd move on the next day," he said. "If I thought I wanted to marry this girl, I'd probably be at the bottom of the bottle listening to an Air Supply CD for three months.

"If you do it via Bill Gates, like my friend, you're bitter for six months."

If a meaningful relationship ends, Harris said to keep your head up.

"It may seem like it's the end of the world, but there's hope, and there are a lot of great people out there," he said. "It's finding a way to grieve that loss and then be able to pick up and move on."

QUIZ | Love it or leave

The Breakup Test: Are you ready to move on? Take this quiz and see how you stack up.

1. Your ex's cell phone number is:
a. Crossed out in your address book. [2 points]
b. Still on your speed dial. [1 point]
c. Only available by calling directory assistance. [3 points]

2. You're going to a mutual friend's party where you're sure to see your ex. You:
a. Bring along your most fun and outgoing friend to guarantee a good time (plus he/she is a great partner for meeting guys/girls!) [3 points]
b. Think about what you'll say to him/her when you first see him/her. It's important that he/she sees how cool, calm and completely over him/her you are. [1 point]
c. Wear your favorite dress/shirt — the one that he/she always complimented you on. [2 points]

3. When your aunt asks about "that charming young man/woman of yours" (she obviously hasn't heard the whole story), you:
a. Burst into tears. [1 point]
b. Give her a quick breakup recap and then move on to a happier subject like how great your job is going. [3 points]
c. Change the subject ASAP. [2 points]

4. You find your ex's sweater in your closet. What do you do with it?
a. Clean with it. [2 points]
b. Sleep with it. [1 point]
c. Donate it. [3 points]

5. It's your ex's birthday. You:
a. Remember the date, wonder how he/she is celebrating and forget about it in the span of a minute. [3 points]
b. Plan girls'/guys' night out — "Sex in the City"/"Swingers" style! [2 points]
c. Give him/her a call. [1 point]

6. When you run into your ex at a mutual friend's wedding, you:
a. Head straight for the open bar. [1 point]
b. Ask your favorite groomsman/bridesmaid to dance. [3 points]
c. Introduce him/her to your incredibly good-looking date. [2 points]

7. Your ex just called. You:
a. Wonder if he's trying to get back together. [2 points]
b. Wonder why it took him so long to call you back. [1 point]
c. Wonder what he wants. [3 points]

8. When "your song" comes on the radio, you:
a. Don't even realize that it's that song until it' almost over. [3 points]
b. Turn it off — you don't need to torture yourself. [1 point]
c. Reminisce about the first time you heard it together. [2 points]

9. You walk into a restaurant and spot your ex with another man/woman. How do you handle it?
a. Turn on your heel and split — you've lost your appetite anyway. [1 point]
b. Take a deep breath, smile over at him/her and sit down at your table. [3 points]
c. Go over to say a friendly hello. It would be nice to talk to him/her (it would also be nice to check her/him out). [2 points]

10. Your ex wants to get back together. What do you do?
a. Agree to meet him/her for coffee — maybe he/she can change. [2 points]
b. Give it another try — there was a reason you got together in the first place. [1 point]
c. Think about it for a few minutes, then remind yourself why you broke up. [3 points]

Add up all your points.

24-30 — You're ready for Mr./Ms. Right. You survived the breakup, but even better, you've picked yourself up and dusted off that post-relationship rubble. You've found your place in the Newly Single's Scene and captured the closure you need. Look out, here you come!

17-23 — You're looking for Mr./Ms. Right now. You're halfway there. It probably wasn't pretty, but you've gotten through most of the messy stuff. Take it easy, take it slow and trust yourself to work through it. While a red-hot rebound man/woman might show you a good night out, he/she truly can't cure your ailing heart. Ditto for anyone named Jack Daniels.

10-16 — You're stuck on Mr./Ms. Wrong. Breaking up is hard to do, and unfortunately no one knows that better than you. If you're still sorting through the "but why's" and "if only's," be patient. Even if you're wondering whether you should get back together, all you need is time. Hang in there — your closure will come.

Arms report delivered

Iraq denies possession of atomic weapons in declaration

By Susanna Loof
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

VIENNA, Austria – The U.N. nuclear agency received Iraq's arms declaration Sunday and began a painstaking analysis to check Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein's claims that he has no atomic weapons or programs to develop them.

Arriving at Vienna's airport, a U.N. inspector handed over a green suitcase full of the 2,100 pages of documents in English and Arabic brought from Baghdad to the International Atomic Energy Agency, the Vienna-based agency that leads the hunt for nuclear arms in Iraq.

The documents, focusing on nuclear activity, are part of a nearly 12,000-page declaration that Iraq was required to submit outlining its biological, chemical and nuclear programs.

Iraq's account will be compared with intelligence provided by other nations and with data from past and present inspections, he said.

The IAEA hopes to provide the Security Council with a preliminary analysis within 10 days, and a more detailed analysis when it reports back to the council in January.

Iraq insists it has no programs for developing nuclear, biological or chemical weapons. It turned over the declaration to U.N. officials on Saturday – a day before the United Nations' deadline.

The United States has threatened war against Iraq if Baghdad has not met U.N. arms control demands. Bush administration officials say they have "solid evidence" that Iraq retains weapons of mass destruction, and will eventually supply it to U.N. inspectors.

Saddam's science adviser, Gen. Amer al-Saadi, called the declaration "accurate, comprehensive and truthful."

Faculty's diversity critical

Different races, sexes enhance college education

By James Hurla
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Mary Douglas found something she said is peculiar about the African-American history course at K-State.

"It's taught by somebody that's not even African-American," said Douglas, secretary of Black Student Union and junior in kinesiology. "I mean, I'm sure they're very knowledgeable and very well-rounded, but it's just weird. I think it depends a lot more on the person's teaching style rather than if they're a man or woman, black or white."

Juanita McGowan, director of American ethnic studies, said having diversity in the faculty is a vital part of the university experience.

"It's important to have a diverse faculty because it broadens the world view of all students," McGowan said.

Having an instructor of the same race or gender does not necessarily affect how well students learn, McGowan said, but the exposure to different cultures is beneficial in the long run.

"It enhances exposure to world views and helps our ability to work and interact with those different than ourselves in the workplace," she said.

According to the university's Integrated Postsecondary Education Data Systems reports, there were 18 black members

Students can cut cable costs by purchasing individual channels, rather than entire packages, thanks to a provision of the Cable Television Consumer Protection and Competition Act of 1992, which went into effect last month.

Kristin Peck, director of public affairs for the Kansas campus of Cox Communications, said the cable company advertises this service to current subscribers through mailings but not through the mass media. People with basic cable, which includes 18 channels and costs about $10 per month, also can purchase a premium channel a la carte for a little more than $10 per month, Peck said.

For example, Cox subscribers can have the basic cable and HBO for a little more than $20 per month, she said. The lineup for basic cable includes the three major networks, the Weather Channel, the Manhattan Channel, FOX and several others.

Peck said that although individual channels are offered, most customers prefer

Four years ago, Willie Wacter performed at the first Black and Gold pageant sponsored by the Alpha Phi Alpha fraternity.

Wacter, junior in music at Wichita State University and Alpha Phi Alpha member, played the alto and soprano saxophones Saturday night at the fourth-annual pageant, "Queens of the Nile."

He said he was excited to be a part of the pageant again.

"Kids on campus look forward to the pageant. It's a little different, with a little more culture," Wacter said.

Megan Smith, senior in apparel design, was crowned Miss Black and Gold 2002. Smith holds the Miss Manhattan title as well.

Queen Daniell Ray, freshman in psychology, gets ready for the evening gown portion of "Queens of the Nile," the fourth-annual Black and Gold beauty pageant in Forum Hall on Saturday.

Smith also won Miss Career for having the highest score from her career wear and introduction, Miss Swimwear for scoring the highest on the swimwear competition, Miss Talent for scoring the highest by reciting the poem "With No Immediate Cause" and Miss Elegance for scoring the highest in the evening gown competition.

"I was very, very nervous, but I just tried to relax and have fun," Smith said. She will receive a $300 scholarship and compete in the regional Miss Black and Gold in Chicago.

Akeia Haddox, junior in hotel and restaurant management, was crowned Miss Gold, or first runner-up, as well as Miss GPA for having the highest overall GPA.

Marquette Shannon, sophomore in mass communications and dance, was crowned Miss Black, or second runner up.

Each of the seven contestants were judged on eight categories: career wear and introduction, swimwear, talent, formal wear, question and answer, ticket sales, GPA and

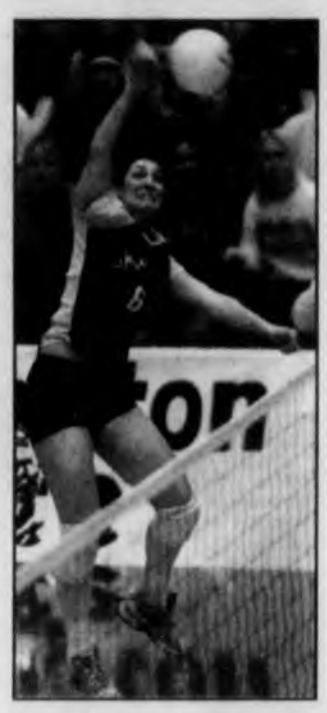
They came on a mission and left with smiling faces and arms full of gifts.

After waiting up to an hour in the early morning chill, the doors opened and missions were accomplished in a matter of minutes.

"It's sort of like the day after Thanksgiving at Wal-Mart," Judy Padgett, director of Toys for Manhattan, said, as families piled into a former Westloop laundromat Saturday morning for the annual Toys of Manhattan event.

Started by veteran Manhattan police officer Al Myers more than 40 years ago, Toys for Manhattan began after a personal eye-opening experience.



While on call one Christmas Eve, Myers went to a home where there were 11 children and only seven presents under the tree.

Awestruck by the sight, Myers then went back to the police station, where he and fellow officers gathered gifts, wrapped them and gave them to the family on Christmas Day.

"It all started because of that family and because he was a police officer," Verleta Myers, Al's daughter-in-law, said.

Vengeful Kentucky resident charged with strange mailbox bombings

By Chuck Shepherd
UNIVERSAL PRESS SYNDICATE

In the latest example of mailbox door rage, George Krushinski was charged with planting small bombs in a mailbox and a letter carrier's vehicle because a weekend carrier had been leaving Krushinski's mailbox door down in Lexington, Ky. "I've warned you many times about leaving my mailbox open," Krushinski wrote, "(and) now you will pay."

British Army officers examining highly motivated potential recruits in the Commonwealth's Pacific island of Fiji reported in November encountering an alarming number of men with marbles sewn under the skin of their penises, apparently to heighten pleasure during sex. According to an Agence France-Presse report, Capt. Sarah East said the marbles were not an automatic disqualifier.

Several news outlets in Johannesburg, South Africa, reported in November that, in front of several witnesses, a 20-foot-long African rock python swallowed a 10-year-old boy in the brush near Lamontville. Some experts, including snake park owner Craig Smith, said the evidence and the witnesses' accounts were credible, especially since the snake had probably recently awakened from hibernation and was famished. According to the boy's terrified playmates, it took about three hours for him to completely disappear.

Awesome

Police in Fulton, Ky., investigating a marijuana-smoking complaint by William Hainline's neighbors in September, found dope burning on a backyard grill with a large fan on the other side of the house sucking the smoke through the home in effect, Police Chief Terry Powell said, "turn(ing) the house into a large marijuana bong." Hainline said he was merely having a 52nd birthday party, but police seized four pounds of marijuana.

Latest religious messages

In October, the Catholic Diocese of St. Petersburg, Fla., became the latest to debut a version of the church's 22-year-old "Theology on Tap" series, introducing young adults to the church by holding lecture and discussion sessions about contemporary issues, mostly sexuality, in local bars, with parishioners and potentials free to eat, drink and smoke.

According to the police report on Farhad Qaumi, 19, who was arrested in Parramatta, Australia, near Sydney, in October and charged with raping a 16-year-old girl, Qaumi said he removed his Islamic pendant before the assault, telling the girl, "I have to take it off, as it is disrespectful."

In Bridgeport, Conn., in October, Roger Chimney, 34, pleaded guilty to two convenience store robberies – the police got him because he had accidentally dropped his name-inscribed Bible at one of the crime scenes.

Creme de la weird

In October in Prince Albert, Saskatchewan, Rosaire Roy was sentenced to a year in jail for hiring someone to rob his store so Roy could fulfill a sexual fantasy – he had arranged for the robber to force him to undress, along with an unsuspecting female acquaintance who was in the store at the time, because Roy wanted to be tied up naked with her.

And in November, sheriff's deputies in Fayette County, Ga., acting on a tip, arrested Sandy Creek High School teacher Damian Belvedere, 44, who, using his webcam, was in the middle of a live Internet performance of fondling himself, nude, in his otherwise empty classroom.

Recurring themes

News of the Weird has reported several times on men either killed or injured falling down embankments at night after stopping their vehicles on the side of the road to seek a secluded place to urinate. In September, Rick Schultz, 34, and James Esposti, 21, were taken to Punxsutawney (Pa.) Hospital after being knocked down when their Ford Ranger truck coasted backward into them while they were urinating at the side of a road.

The art of protest by sewing one's lips together is apparently becoming more popular. A 34-year-old man in Estonia, facing a charge of setting a Mercedes-Benz on fire, showed up in court with stitched lips in May.

And in June, 50 refugees, held at the Woomera detention center in Australia, sewed their lips shut to emphasize their hunger strike as they lobbied for asylum.

Prayer vigil provides outlet for peaceful protest

Religious groups gather to protest against violence, advocate peace

By Amy Link
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

They were there to protest war with Iraq, but there was no shouting or picketing. Instead, their weapon was prayer.

Students of multiple faiths gathered in the K-State Student Union from 1 to 9 p.m. Saturday to take part in a Prayer for Peace Vigil.

David Jones, campus pastor for Ecumenical Campus Ministry, helped organize the event.

Jones said eight groups participated in the vigil.

Each group spent time in silent prayer, reading from scriptures or whatever else group members wanted to do to show their desire for peace in Iraq.

The groups included United Methodist Campus Ministry, Campus Crusade for Christ, St. Francis Canterbury, Hillel, Muslim Student Association, Students for India, Lutheran Campus Ministry and Ecumenical Campus Ministry.

"The objective is for students to come together and pray for peace in Iraq," Jones said.

"We want to tap into the spiritual power that can overcome differences between nations."

Jones said he was concerned many people were not aware of how serious the lingering war with Iraq is.

He said everyone will be affected if the United States decides to go to war.

Zach Lawrence, senior in secondary education, took part in the vigil.

He said he thought there was a need for people to hear the pacifists' points of view.

Lawrence said he believed aggression and war counteract finding solutions and that there was a definite need for the vigil.

"I thought it was important to show support for peaceful relationships with others," Lawrence said.

Nicole Donnert | COLLEGIAN
Reverends Mitch and Jan Todd from First United Methodist Church discuss ways to bring peace to the world with a group of K-State students and a Fort Riley soldier during the vigil Saturday in the K-State Student Union.

Lawrence and others left messages for peace on the wall in Union 202 after taking part in the event.

Each person offered a prayer or a wish for a peaceful world.

Lawrence said he believed the vigil could have an effect on the decision about going to war.

"I think it can (produce results) if it's a local effort," Lawrence said.

He also said peace is derived from the inner self.

"Part of prayer is to center yourself," Lawrence said.

"You can't promote peace outside yourself until you're peaceful within yourself."

DIVERSITY | Report indicates K-State's diversity levels improving

on the full-time faculty in fall 2001, compared with 82 Asian members and 1,021 Caucasian members. The fall 1997 report shows 13 black people, 81 Asian people and 1,062 Caucasian people on the full-time faculty. The number of men and women in these positions changed from 913 men and 291 women in 1997, to 866 men and 326 women in 2001.

IPEDS reports
K-State's IPEDS reports, dating back to 1997, are available at www.k-state.edu/pa/statinfo/ipeds/ipeds.

Full-time executive-administrative and managerial positions in 2001 included 12 who were black, three who were Asian and 240 Caucasian members. Men held 162 of these positions, while women held 107. In 1997, 13 black members, six Asian people and 218 Caucasian people held the same types of positions. The disparity between men and women in these positions in 1997 was 159 men compared to 90 women.

Clyde Howard, director of affirmative action, said the IPEDS report for fall 2002 should be available online within the next two months. Howard said the duty of affirmative action is to make sure everyone has an equal opportunity to be employed at K-State.

"We make sure departments understand they have to recruit in places that might yield qualified applicants," Howard said. "They need to be conscious of the fact that they have to cast a wider net."

Once a variety of people are in a pool of applicants, affirmative action is in place to make sure all are treated fairly, he said.

"Race and/or gender have always been taken into account," Howard said. "How could you not take it into account? If you see them, you're going to take that into account."

Howard said the purpose of affirmative action is to change the way an institution looks, while diversity changes the way an institution works. He said affirmative action usually tries to assimilate people into the system, whereas the concept of diversity allows new ideas and perspectives to influence the way an institution operates.

Douglas said she thinks there needs to be more diversity across campus, not just within the faculty.

"When people see BSU, they think it's just for black people," she said. "One of our goals this year is to get everybody out. I've handed out fliers to everybody, and we still only get black faces at our events."

Researchers uncover methods to eliminate Listeria bacteria

USDA-funded study effective in reducing harm in cold hot dogs

By Tristan Hinderliter
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It's time to warn your roommate who likes to eat hot dogs directly out of the package – by not reheating hot dogs, he could be exposing himself to deadly bacteria.

Researchers at the K-State Food Science Institute have discovered an effective way of reheating hot dogs to eliminate any such harmful bacteria.

Heating a hot dog wrapped in a paper towel in the microwave for 60 seconds is an effective way to eliminate Listeria monocytogenes, said Curtis Kastner, director of the K-State Food Science Institute.

"Listeria outbreaks are fairly low, but the reason it's so significant is because the percentage of deaths that result from that organism are the highest," Kastner said.

Listeria causes 2,500 serious illnesses and 500 deaths each year. It primarily affects pregnant women, older adults and persons with weakened immune systems, according to a USDA news release.

Teresa Ortega, a doctoral graduate student, conducted the experiment. She took already-packaged hot dogs and put Listeria on them in a laboratory to see which reheating process would most effectively kill the bacteria.

"Listeria is around us – it can get on the product," Kastner said. "It could be a contaminant just because you've taken it out of its casing and it's exposed to the environment and Listeria gets on it."

Ortega compared Listeria reductions of seven ways to reheat a hot dog, including common household practices such as boiling the frank in water for 30 seconds, boiling it for 60 seconds, cooking it in an electric oven for 2 minutes, cooking it in an electric oven for 5 minutes, microwaving it for 60 seconds and microwaving it in water for 60 seconds.

However, she found that microwaving the hot dog for 60 seconds wrapped in a paper towel was the most effective way for eliminating Listeria.

"The way a microwave heats, it causes the surface of that product to get warm, and then it begins to emit steam. If you wrap something around that, that steam that comes off is concentrated right at the surface and you can get an additional effect," Kastner said.

Hot dog manufacturers may use a process like a steam-pasteurizer to kill any possible Listeria on hot dogs after they are packaged, Kastner said, but you can do the same thing at home.

"You don't have to have Oscar Mayer run the package through this steam-pasteurizer – they might want to – but then, when you've got it home, you can take it and heat it in hot water or cook it in the microwave to kill the bacteria yourself," he said.

Heating hot dogs to kill bacteria that could have on them is safer than eating them right out of the package, Kastner said.

The USDA funded K-State's hot dog experiment.

The USDA Food Safety and Inspection Service has issued a "zero tolerance" for Listeria monocytogenes in ready-to-eat meat and poultry products.

Results of the study could be used on product labels, advising consumers how best to reheat products to eliminate possible bacteria. Kastner said results would most likely be disseminated through the K-State Research and Extension service.

Kastner said this experiment is the most up-to-date project concerning elimination of Listeria on hot dogs. Other principle researchers on the project were Harshavardhan Thippareddi, Randall Phebus and James Marsden, all of the K-State Food Science Institute.

OPINION

TO THE POINT

Importance of giving should not be forgotten

Becoming involved with the Manhattan community may be as easy as buying a present.

Toys for Manhattan, an annual campaign that took place Saturday and will occur again next Saturday, accepts new and used toys for underprivileged children.

This is an excellent way for students to give back to the Manhattan community.

Even though many students don't consider Manhattan their home, it is important for all to be involved in their community. Thinking of others during the holiday season is a great way to do so – especially if it means making a child happy.

When we were children, most of us were fortunate enough to receive gifts for the holidays. The children who benefit from Toys for Manhattan are not as fortunate as we were.

This year, as you shop for parents, girlfriends, boyfriends, brothers and sisters, stop and pick up a toy you can donate to Toys for Manhattan, or, if funds are tight this year, find an old favorite you think can bring some new joy to a child. Take the toys to 1129 Gardenway (the former Westloop laundromat) on Saturday, and pat yourself on the back for bringing a little holiday cheer to a Manhattan child.

To the point is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

I met this elegant, assertive, kind and intelligent lady in Costa Rica when she came with her husband to visit the country and the president.

They were coming on a noble mission – to start building new opportunities for academic exchange between the teachers and students of K-State and the Technological Institute of Costa Rica.

They were committed to the higher-educational goal of enhancing and developing the international education of Costa Ricans.

They were arriving from a university located in an agricultural state that had helped Kansas farmers for more than a century to solve the geological, atmospheric and water control problems that hindered the economic development of their state.

We welcomed them because we knew they were able to understand our own national agricultural and economic problems and help us to solve them.

But this distinguished lady was not only interested in the ecological aspects of our country, but also particularly curious about its culture and arts.

When she expressed her desire to visit the art museums, I offered to take her on a tour.

I was a bit apprehensive because my English was very poor and I had been told that she had been a key person in the creation of the K-State art museum.

But all my fears vanished when I met her.

She was a nice, understanding, flexible and kind person.

From her gentle and genuine attitude, a deep and wonderful friendship was born.

Tirelessly, she supported me in my desire to come to K-State to get a doctoral degree.

She helped me when the obstacles seemed to be insurmountable, when I almost lost hope, and provided me with unwavering support.

Thanks to that support, I am here at K-State.

When I published the book, "Genders allied, not sexes opposed," she wrote an inspiring and profound introductory message.

She expressed her personal commitment "to begin a dialogue across the genders about what we are doing to break down the barriers that keep women from reaching their full potential."

I discovered in her words what I had noted in her own life and personal behavior.

She is a highly educated American woman with a profound academic mind, but with eyes open wide from her life experiences.

She is not a theorist, but a thinking woman, daughter, mother, wife and humanist. She has learned in the classrooms of life that the world cries for justice and understanding on gender issues.

This American lady carries within her all the best attributes and features of the American culture.

Her international mind and universal heart let her stand with us, the Latin American women, for a better and more equitable future for us all.

She has helped women like me, coming from underdeveloped societies, traditionally driven to limit the horizon of women, to have faith in our own intellectual potential, and to value the gifts that nature has given to the human female.

Her name is Ruth Ann Wefald, and she is the wife of university President Jon Wefald.

She is the campus first lady who opens the doors of the university to international students, and without her help, I would never have had the opportunity to get the best international education in the world.

Thanks, Ruth Ann, for helping so many people to use our God-given talents and abilities to unite the genders, the cultures, the ethnic groups and the nations of the world in a more perfect union.

Conocí a esta elengante, asertiva, amable e inteligente dama en Costa Rica, cuando ella fue con su esposo a visitar mi país y al presidente de la República.

Ellos llegaron en una noble misión académica, desarrollar nuevas oportunidades de intercambio entre los profesores y estudiantes de Kansas State University y del Instituto Tecnológico de Costa Rica.

Estaban comprometidos con la máxima meta de la educación superior de realzar y desarrollar la educación internacional de los costarricenses.

Ellos provenían de una universidad localizada en un estado netamente agrícola, que ha permitido a sus agricultores, durante más de un siglo, solventar los problemas agrícolas, atmosféricos y de control de agua que estaban atrasando el desarrollo económico.

Nosotros les dimos la bienvenida porque ellos estaban en capacidad de entender y ayudar a resolver nuestros propios conflictos en las mismas áreas.

Esta distinguida dama no estaba solamente interesada en los aspectos ecológicos de mi país, también tenía una particular curiosidad en la cultura y las artes.

Cuando ella expresó su deseo de visitar los museos de arte, me ofrecí a llevarla en un recorrido.

Eso fue bastante arriesgado de mi parte porque mi inglés era muy pobre, y además me habían comentado que ella fue la persona clave en la creación del museo de KSU.

Pero todos mis temores se desvanecieron cuando la conocí. Me di cuenta de que era un ser humano gentil, comprensivo y flexible.

De su actitud bondadosa y genuina nació una profunda y maravillosa amistad. Sin desmayar, me dio todo su apoyo en mi deseo de venir a KSU a obtener un doctorado.

Me ayudó cuando los obstáculos parecían insuperables y cuando casi perdía la esperanza; siempre me dio su continuo, solidario y firme respaldo.

Gracias a eso estoy aquí en esta universidad.

Cuando publiqué el libro "Géneros Aliados, no Sexos Opuestos", ella escribió un mensaje introductorio inspirador y profundo.

Allí ella expresaba su compromiso personal de "empezar a dialogar entre ambos géneros sobre lo que estamos haciendo para romper las barreras que impiden a las mujeres alcanzar todo su potencial". Descubrí en sus palabras lo que ya había notado en su propia vida y comportamiento personal.

Ella es una mujer estadounidense altamente educada, con una mente académica, pero con sus ojos ampliamente abiertos a la experiencia de la vida. No es una teórica, pero sí una mujer pensante, hija y madre, esposa y humanista.

Ella ha aprendido en el aula de la vida, que el mundo clama por justicia y entendimiento en lo que a asuntos de género se refiere.

Esta dama estadounidense lleva consigo los mejores atributos y características de su cultura.

Su mente internacional y su corazón universal la mantienen junto a nosotras, las mujeres latinoamericanas, en la búsqueda de un futuro mejor y más igualitario para todas.

Ella ha ayudado a mujeres como yo, provenientes de sociedades en desarrollo, tradicionalmente limitadoras del horizonte de la mujer, a tener fe en nuestro propio potencial intelectual, y a valorar los dones que la naturaleza nos ha dado.

Su nombre es Ruth Ann Wefald, y es la esposa del presidente Wefald.

Ella es la primera dama del campus de KSU que mantiene abiertas las puertas de la universidad a los estudiantes internacionales quienes, sin su ayuda, nunca habrían tenido la oportunidad de obtener la mejor educación internacional en el mundo.

Gracias Ruth Ann por ayudarnos a tantos a usar los talentos y habilidades para unificar los géneros, las culturas, los grupos étnicos y las naciones del mundo en una mejor unión.

MUSICALLY ROOTED

5th Roots album experiments in hip-hop

"PHRENOLOGY"
Album review By JJ Duncan

Put this disc in when you have some time, and there is no way you will take it out before track five.

In fact, you don't even notice that you've listened to eight tracks before you get to the smooth R&B single, "Break You Off."

The first track, "Rock You," drops a heavy but simple drum loop that runs through the entire song under the boastful rhymes.

But before you know what's going on, the Roots burst out a 24-second screaming punk rock song they attribute to lessons from Bad Brains and Minor Threat. The next track, "Sacrifice," makes sure the front end of this album is stacked tight without frontloading singles.

"Phrenology" is one of the most well-developed albums around, and other hip-hop artists could learn something about not wasting track time with random fillers.

Following up 1999's Grammy-winning album, "Things Fall Apart," the new album is an evolution that blends live instruments with loops, samples, rhymes, beatboxing and well-used guest appearances in an excellent production that is interesting all the way to the end.

Just like "Things Fall Apart," this album not only will please hip-hop fans, but it also will drop the jaw of anyone who thinks hip-hop can't be truly musical.

Lyrically, Black Thought (a.ka. Tariq Trotter) takes the listener on a journey that follows a logical progression. Thematically, the songs are either about the contempt he feels for mainstream rappers that are just in it for themselves, or about what it takes to keep things real.

In "Pussy Galore," Black chastizes materialistic rappers, but in "Water," he explains how music can save lives in a round-about sort of way.

In the song, he makes the statement that if you see someone slipping into a life of drugs, "You better be a true friend to 'em / Before the * put an end to 'em / Or give a pen to 'em / Or lock 'em up in the studio with a mic / 'Cause on the real it might save his life."

The real delight of the album is in the musical experimentation. "The Seed (2.0)," produced by and co-starring Cody ChestnuTT is kept raw, and is done nearly all on live instruments.

Follow that up with the slick "Break You Off" and finally "Water," and your ears won't be getting bored anytime soon.

After "a.the first movement" is over in "Water," DJ Scratch delves deep into beats and ambient noises with some friends for a good six minutes.

If you've never heard of the Roots, do yourself a favor and listen to this.

Selma Hayek brings Mexican artist to big screen

Strong cast performances outshine lacking script; audience misses bigger picture of Kahlo's life

"Frida"
Movie review By Adam Lee

Selma Hayek has longed to bring the story of Frida Kahlo to the screen.

Hayek's contribution to "Frida" goes beyond merely producing and starring in the film – this is the role she was born to play.

The film chronicles all the significant events of Kahlo's life: the violent trolley accident in her adolescence, her relationship with muralist Diego Rivera, her involvement with the Communist Party, and her alcohol and drug dependencies.

Kahlo led a fascinating life, which makes for a fascinating film, despite its shortcomings.

Hayek shines as the matriarch of modern Mexican art. Her performance as Kahlo from a young woman to her death bed is captivating and genuine. Her character's trademark uni-brow doesn't keep Hayek from being incredibly sexy. She brings a passion and sensualism to her role that is both alluring and appropriate.

Hayek is backed by a strong supporting cast whose authentic performances help to create a strong sense of time and place.

Alfred Molina almost steals the spotlight with his portrayal of Rivera and memorable cameos are made by Antonio Banderas, Edward Norton and Ashley Judd.

Director Julie Taymor, best known for her puppet-filled Broadway adaptation of "The Lion King," has created a film that is as vivid and surreal as Kahlo's paintings. Her lush depiction of Mexico City establishes a clear connection between the brilliant colors and curious mysticism of the city streets and that of Kahlo's art.

But Taymor's most thrilling approach at story-telling is her use of paintings as sets. Kahlo's canvases are imaginatively brought to life with animated elements and inserted cast members.

These sequences are clever and cool but aren't adequate in fusing Kahlo's art with her life.

The majority of Kahlo's work are self-portraits. She once said, "I paint myself because I am so often alone, because I am the subject I know best." In "Frida," the artist is never alone, and the film is deficient in creating a deeper understanding of the woman and her paintings.

This movie might have been more accurately titled "Frida and Diego." Kahlo is never entirely outside of Rivera's gravity, and the traits of the independent artist and woman she aspired to be remain largely undeveloped.

In the film, it seems as though Kahlo is shown delivering Diego his lunch more often than working on her own pieces.

"Frida" is an excellent study of the artist's life, but it fails in examining what made that life so important – the art.

Volleyball's 4-game loss to Washington State ends NCAA tournament run, chance at Sweet 16

Saturday's 2nd round
Game 1: Wash St. 32, KSU 30
Game 2: KSU 30, Wash St. 21
Game 3: Wash St. 30, KSU 22
Game 2: Wash St. 31, KSU 29

K-State's final dance of the year was an emotional one.

Up 26-24 in the fourth game of Saturday's second round, NCAA tournament match against Washington State, it looked as though the Cats would push the contest to a fifth and decisive game.

But Washington State had other plans.

The Cougars closed out the game, and K-State, on a 7-3 run – denying the Cats a chance to advance to the Sweet 16.

"I thought we were in it for most of the match," a teary-eyed Coach Suzie Fritz said. "I thought our quick hitters were exceptional this evening. I thought that Gabby (Guerre) made very good choices.

"When it comes down to it, most of the time, in volleyball, you win and lose matches on the left side. And their left side was very good, their outside hitters included. And that is where it got away from us."

For K-State, junior middle blocker Lauren Goehring was All-American-esque on the night.

The 6-foot junior from Fort Worth, Texas, had a career-high 20 kills on a blistering .436 hitting percentage.

But what Goehring was doing for K-State, senior LaToya Harris was doing for Washington State.

Harris, who attacked from nearly every spot on the court, had 23 kills.

However, the difference, Goehring said, wasn't Harris.

In game four, when the contest was close and the points could have gone either way, it was the Cougars' defense that propelled the team, she said.

"When I expected the ball to be down, it wasn't," Goehring said. "They are a very tough team. They made some good defensive plays. They threw the ball around a lot – they didn't make a lot of errors."

Washington State had just 27 errors on 203 total attacks. The Cougars saw four players score in double figures.

For the Wildcats, sophomore middle blocker Lisa Martin assisted Goehring with 15 kills. K-State had four players with double-digit kills on the night, led by junior libero Laura Downey-Wallace, who had 23.

Fritz said she was proud of the way her team played in its final match of the season. A couple of breaks didn't go K-State's way, she said, and when the Cats needed a side out, they just couldn't get it.

"We got stuck in a rotation for a couple of points," Fritz said. "We needed to be able to side out with them and not let them put a string of points together. Maybe they get one every once in a while, maybe they get two, but we can't let one server go back there and rattle off three points in a row. We let that happen too many times."

K-State finished its season with a 21-9 record.

Friday's 1st round
Game 1: KSU 30, Mich. 26
Game 2: KSU 30, Mich. 25
Game 3: KSU 35, Mich. 33

Goehring had 16 kills and Martin and senior outside hitter Jennifer Pollard chipped in 11 apiece as K-State rolled into the second round of the NCAA tournament with a three-game sweep over Michigan.

The Wolverines made game three interesting, taking the Cats to extra points, but K-State closed with back-to-back points, sending Michigan packing.

"Kansas State did a great job, especially in game one and two," Michigan coach Mark Rosen said. "We kind of got in trouble late in game three, but we regrouped well, especially at the end of the game. Unfortunately, we didn't get some breaks, and we weren't able to pull that one out."

K-State middle blocker steps up as go-to player

When K-State needed a kill, the team looked to junior middle blocker Lauren Goehring.

When opposing blockers stepped up to block the kill, Goehring swung hard through the wall to get the point. She was the go-to player all season, Coach Suzie Fritz said.

"I've said it before, and I'll say it again," Fritz said, "I think she's one of the best middle blockers in the country. She's absolutely fabulous."

Goehring showed this why she's one of the best in the first and second rounds of the NCAA Tournament at Ahearn Field House.

Friday night in the win against Michigan, she had 16 kills on 28 attacks with only five errors, a .393 hitting percentage.

Saturday night in the loss to Washington State, she amassed 20 kills on 39 attacks with only three errors, a .436 hitting percentage.

Women breeze to tourney title

Coming into this weekend's Commerce Bank Wildcat Classic at Bramlage Coliseum, K-State women's basketball players were probably expecting to pick up two wins.

And pick up two wins they did.

The Wildcats beat Middle Tennessee State 79-61 on Friday night and handled Weber State 60-36 Saturday to move to 8-1 on the year.

But in the beginning, things didn't go as smoothly as the Wildcats may have been expecting.

In the game against Middle Tennessee State, Coach Deb Patterson said, K-State allowed the Lady Raiders to dictate the pace of the game.

Sophomore Laurie Koehn drives past Middle Tennessee State's Keisha McClinic during K-State's first-round win in the Commerence Bank Wildcat Classic on Friday night. Koehn had 25 points and seven 3-pointers.

"It was very subtle, but I felt like they were controlling tempo," she said. "I really give them a lot of credit. In many ways, despite the score, they controlled the game in a lot of aspects."

At the half, the Lady Raiders were down just seven points to the heavily favored Wildcats.

Patterson said poor defense in the first half allowed Middle Tennessee State to stay close.

"Our second-half defense was certainly better," she said. "But our first-half defense was so poor in terms of what we allowed Middle Tennessee. We really had established kind of a hole in a way – not necessarily a scoring hole, but it was difficult for us to get this game in gear."

The Cats might not have been in gear against Middle Tennessee State, but they still won the game by a good margin.

Four Wildcat starters – juniors Laurie Koehn and Nicole Ohlde and sophomores Kendra Wecker and Megan Mahoney – broke into double-digit scoring against the Lady Raiders.

Koehn tied a career high for three-pointers against MTSU, going seven for 13 to lead all

It took 10 straight hours of football in three key games Saturday, but at last K-State found out its bowl future Sunday afternoon.

Athletic Director Tim Weiser confirmed Sunday that it would be a sunny holiday season for the Wildcats.

In a conference call with bowl officials, Coach Bill Snyder and reporters, Weiser said K-State had accepted an invitation to the Pacific Life Holiday Bowl.

"On behalf of Kansas State University, we are delighted to accept," Weiser said.

K-State will play at 7 p.m. on Friday, Dec. 27 in San Diego, Calif., at Qualcomm Stadium.

The Cats' bowl future seemed bright after Saturday night's games, but they didn't find out their opponent until the official announcement Sunday afternoon.

K-State will play Arizona State from the Pacific 10 Conference.

Snyder said playing the Sun Devils in San Diego is a great honor. He said he has a great deal of respect for both the Arizona State program, and the Holiday Bowl.

"We have never had anything but a spectacular time in San Diego," Snyder said. "We have a great deal of respect for Arizona State. They will certainly present a

The St. Louis Rams' disappointing season hit a new low Sunday.

Dante Hall returned a kickoff and a punt for a touchdown, one week after running back a punt 90 yards for a score, as the Kansas City Chiefs defeated the injury-depleted Rams 49-10 Sunday.

St. Louis lost its third straight after winning five in a row.

Hall, who'd done almost nothing his first two years in the NFL and battled all through training camp for a spot on the roster, is the second man in the NFL this year to score on two kick returns in a game, and the first Kansas City player to ever do it.

TOYS | Donated gifts help underprivileged children

Forty years later, Al's project has grown into a community-wide effort that helps underprivileged families provide presents for their family members.

Each fall, Toys for Manhattan receives thousands of donated new and used toys and gifts for children.

"Everything here is donated," said Padgett, who is in her first year as director. "Schools do collections, and big organizations and families just get together and start collecting all year for this."

Standing amidst tables full of board games and stuffed animals, Junction City resident Keisha Harris carefully examined her sack full of presents, making sure she didn't forget anything for her two brothers and son, who were on the top of her gift list.

"I think they'll enjoy the presents I picked out," she said, smiling.

Toys

Toys for Manhattan will begin again at 8 a.m. Saturday at 1129 Garden Way (formerly Westloop laundromat).

After hearing about the Toys for Manhattan program, Harris said she came because of financial reasons.

"These gifts are free, and it's a good little program here," she said.

Karla Johnson, Manhattan resident, spent most of the morning looking at the shelves of stuffed animals and dolls for her 3-month-old twins and her nieces and nephews.

"I got a lot of Cabbage Patch dolls and stuffed animals," she said.

"I have lots of nieces and nephews to shop for, and there's lots of choices and nice stuff."

Although Al Myers could not continue his directorship because of health reasons, Verleta Myers said she was just as happy to work under Padgett, who coincidentally has been a close friend since the second grade.

"Since Pops couldn't be here, I said I gotta help Judy," Verleta said. "It doesn't seem like Christmas until I go help out."

Padgett agreed and said she enjoys seeing those families walk out of the store with gifts they could not have purchased otherwise.

"I like seeing people have stuff they wouldn't have had the money to buy," she said.

While a majority of the donated gifts are used, Verleta said it's the presents that are the most special.

"We don't like to call them used toys," she said. "We like to call them experienced ones."

career-high number of kills.

But Goehring said she was surprised because she didn't think she played that well against the Cougars.

"Personally, I didn't feel like I connected very well," she said. "I was out of rhythm, but I did what I could. I just didn't feel like I could get started until late. But I was seeing the block well tonight, so that helped."

Goehring was especially effective in game three when she hit six for six with zero errors.

Nobody could top that performance, but Washington State middle hitter LaToya Harris tried. In that same game, Harris hit six of eight with one error. She totaled 23 kills in the contest.

With both teams hitting well, Goehring said, the difference was in the defense.

"They made some great defensive plays," she said. "The rallies were long, and we felt a little fatigued. The defensive plays made the difference."

Go-to Goehring

Junior middle blocker Lauren Goehring was on this weekend as K-State played host to the first two rounds of the NCAA tournament. Here is a look at her performances.

- Friday versus Michigan — 16 kills, .393 hitting percentage, 3 blocks
- Saturday versus Washington State — 20 kills, .436 hitting percentage, 4 blocks

Statistically, both teams' defenses were about the same. K-State had 11 team blocks to Washington State's 10, and K-State had 86 digs compared to Washington State's 79.

Washington State coach Cindy Fredrick said she was glad her team's defense showed up.

When you face a team with players like Goehring, Fredrick said, you have to hope your defense can stop them from gaining momentum. And she knew that meant stopping Goehring.

"She's a frightening hitter because she's an explosive hitter," Fredrick said. "She puts down a lot of heat on that ball."

Michigan State coach Mark Rosen also had his eyes on Goehring before Friday's match.

"We knew coming in she was going to be a go-to player," he said. "She has good vision, and because you have to respect K-State's other attackers, you have to go one on one with her. Then, with her vision, she gets the points."

Goehring will be back on the court next year as a senior. One thing she said she had talked about all season was to make it further in the NCAA tournament – a Sweet 16 appearance.

But that goal will have to wait until next season.

the largest financial contribution to the souvenir book.

Antoinette McElroy, freshman in management information systems and elementary education, was crowned Miss Sisterhood, which was voted on by the contestants to determine who showed the most sisterhood during the pageant.

Talia Toles, freshman in preveterinary medicine/animal science, was crowned Miss Souvenir Book.

"I really think it's a good experience for the girls who would like to find other ways to express their womanhood or creativity," said Elisha O'Neal, graduate student in education and administration.

Miss Black and Gold 2001, Lanise Babb, senior in psychology, crowned the new winners.

Myra Gordon, associate provost of diversity and dual career development, judged the pageant this year and said it was one of the most difficult things she has done.

"The reason Megan Smith won is because she was the most complete package in terms of presentation, poise, confidence and articulation," Gordon said.

Brandon Clark, junior in public relations and event coordinator, said that four years ago, Alpha Phi Alpha wanted the opportunity to honor the accomplishments and beauty of black women.

As a part of the opening ceremonies, members of Alpha Phi Alpha gave yellow carnations to every woman in the audience.

"We wanted to show our respect of women and build self-esteem of every young lady, whether in the audience, in a swimsuit or in an evening gown," Clark said.

Orion Carrington, senior in finance and president of Alpha Phi Alpha, said the Black and Gold pageant is a benefit in itself.

"It's important for any African-American on campus and in society," Carrington said. "It uplifts women and builds self-confidence as a whole every time."

scorers with 25 points.

Against Weber State on Saturday in an all-Wildcat final, K-State was able to get its defense and offense in gear.

The Wildcats gave up just 12 first-half points to Weber State, cruising to an easy 24-point win.

Wecker led all scorers with 18 for the Wildcats. Ohlde chipped in 10.

Weber State coach Carla Taylor said K-State's personnel are second to none.

"If you play a normal defense, they will run an offensive clinic against you," Taylor said. "Their spacing is so good, and their players read so well.

Classic performances

Here are some top performers from this weekend's Wildcat Classic

- Kendra Wecker — 18 points, 7 rebounds against Weber State
- Laurie Koehn — 25 points, 7 for 13 from three-point land

"The problem is, they are two-dimensional offensively, and probably their biggest strength is their transition game. We kind of got a schooling in transition tonight."

K-State was good in pushing the ball, scoring 21 points off fast breaks. Weber State, in contrast, wasn't able to manage any points in transition.

Mahoney, who had five points, six rebounds, four assists and a steal against WSU, said K-State is a team that is always going to look for an advantage on the fast break.

"It's just a matter of boxing out and getting the boards," she said. "When we have the opportunity to get numbers, we want to push the ball."

Patterson said K-State's intensity in the final game was an improvement over the Wildcats' effort against Middle Tennessee State.

"I was really pleased with the intensity we brought to the floor against Weber State," she said. "We didn't just play random basketball. We made good, aggressive decisions in transition. I think it was a much better night."

packages.

"I don't know how many of our customers do (buy individual channels)," she said. "Our research shows subscribers prefer a broader variety of channels."

Students living on campus have similar options, said Jerry Marrow, cable TV administrator for K-State Telecommunications.

For basic cable, students pay $15 per month and get 34 channels. To get premium channels individually, however, Marrow said students need to order PowerCat Service, which is $30 a month and includes the basic service, plus about 45 more channels, including HBO, the Discovery Channel, A&E Network, MTV, the four ESPN channels and Comedy Central.

"I require they take PowerCat Service to buy premium channels a la carte," he said. "Then they can purchase Showtime, Cinemax, Starz/Encore or a movie channel package.

A lot of students get the movie channel package for four dollars a month."

He said the $4 movie package includes Showtime 2, ShowCase and MoreMax.

All information on channels and costs for Wildcat Cable are offered on the telecommunications Web site at www.telecom.ksu.edu.

BOWLS | Football accepts Holiday Bowl invitation

challenge for us."

Like K-State, Arizona State was forced to wait until this weekend to unwrap its bowl surprise. The Sun Devils completed their season two weeks ago with a win against intrastate rival Arizona, sewing up the Pac-10's No. 3 spot in the bowl rundown.

But there was much speculation over whether the Holiday Bowl would take a more local team – like UCLA – or go with a different Pac-10 team, like Oregon State. But in the end, choosing Arizona State boiled down to trying to put the best possible matchup on the field, Holiday Bowl executive director Bruce Binkowiski said.

"When we talked it all out, our selection committee felt Arizona State was the best opponent in the conference," Binkowski said. "They have an exciting young team. We really think this matchup between Arizona State and Kansas State has the potential of being one of the more exciting bowl games on the schedule."

With one month to go in the season, Arizona State was tied for first in its conference, and sitting on a 7-2 record and No. 16 ranking. But the team stumbled at season's end, losing three of its final four to finish unranked and 8-5.

The Wildcats and Sun Devils have played two mutual opponents this season. K-State beat both Nebraska, 49-13, and Southern California, 27-20. Arizona State lost to Nebraska, 48-10, and fell to USC, 34-13.

The 2002 Holiday Bowl marks K-State's 10th consecutive postseason appearance. This year's game will be the third Holiday Bowl during that stretch. In their 1995 trip to San Diego, the Cats defeated Colorado State 54-21. Then, in 1999, K-State beat Washington 24-20.

Senior named Rhodes scholar

Student excited, nervous about prestigious award

By Rogie Dorpinghaus
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

There were 981 applicants for the Rhodes Scholarship, from 341 different colleges, and only 32 winners.

Ben Champion
SENIOR IN CHEMISTRY

One of the 32 winners is 22-year-old Ben Champion, senior in chemistry, natural resources and environmental sciences, with minors in Spanish and political science.

"Ben Champion proved he was an academic champion," President Jon Wefald said. "I'd say to win the Rhodes Scholarship is the ultimate. There's probably not an academic scholarship anywhere in the world more prestigious."

Wefald said that when you consider that 1.5 million students graduate from four-year colleges and only 32 can receive the Rhodes Scholarship, it makes the Rhodes Scholarship the most extraordinary honor one could receive. The scholarship provides $40,000 to $60,000 to support two years of study at Oxford University.

"I was an odd mix of elated and scared out of my mind when I found out," Champion said. "There's so much stigma surrounding the award, and it's a life-altering event. I'm excited to do it, but it's going to be a lot of hard work and effort. I'm looking forward to the challenge."

Housing options explored

City officials, developers address need for options

By Kecia Seyb
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Students can choose where to live off campus in Manhattan. Someday they'll have more.

Although no housing strictly for students is under construction, developers are planning high-density living projects for the future.

Pebblebrook Apartment Homes, located on Anderson Avenue next to Frank Anneberg Park, is in the construction phase, but these two-bedroom, one bath and two-bedroom, two bath apartments will not be student-oriented. Professionals and military personnel also will live there, said Mike Hill, owner of Hill Investment and Rental.

"We've found in our niche, when done properly, we can mix the three groups and not have much conflict," he said.

Hill said his company is in the middle of the project, which eventually will consist of 200 units. Some units will be available August 2003, he said.

Last year, Hill also bought

Zac Cook unloads bags from a plane Sunday night at the Manhattan Airport. Cook has worked part time at the airport for three months while juggling school and being student body president.

Student body president juggles work, school

By James Hurla
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The student body is represented by a man in a blue jumpsuit with a reflective orange stripe.

Zac Cook not only serves as student body president, but works for American Airways Express at the Manhattan Regional Airport. One of the benefits of this job is free flights to anywhere American flies.

This privilege should come in handy next semester when Cook is planning to travel to Europe to visit his fiancee, Mary Hoke. She will spend six weeks in Prague, Czech Republic, and will leave about a week after the couple returns from their Argentinean honeymoon.

"If I leave early Saturday morning," he said as he typed airline codes into the computer, "I can spend two hours in Munich before I have to leave to make it back by Sunday night."

Although he said he probably won't travel on such a tight schedule, Cook knows the option is open. In his down time at the airport, he sometimes likes to play travel agent for himself, figuring out destinations he could visit and return from during the course of a weekend.

Working nearly 30 hours per week at the airport, in addition to about 25 hours per week fulfilling his duties as student body president, Cook said he has seen his grades slip this semester.

But Student Body Vice President Todd Kohman said Cook handles his responsibilities well, prioritizing and trying not to let his service to the Student Governing Association suffer.

"It doesn't really affect his work for SGA," Kohman said. "It seems to get done, I think, because it's prioritized over some other things.

"I think his availability is about the only thing that has suffered – although his teachers might say something different."

Despite concerns that a second job would take away from his SGA duties, Cook said there are always members of his cabinet in the office when he is away. He will attempt to make himself more available in the spring semester, but he said his cabinet members are always able to contact him.

Cook's duties at the airport include carrying bags, collecting fees, doing paperwork, directing planes as they park and de-icing planes' wings in the winter. The job can be physically demanding, he said, because there normally are 10 flights coming in and out of the airport each day, and with up to 19 passengers per plane, the weight of the baggage can add up quickly.

April Crubel, senior in social science who works full-time at the airport, said Cook's presence is welcome.

"Zac is responsible," she said. "He's pleasant to work with, and he's a fast learner."

In the past, Cook's parents helped pay for college costs, and he installed sprinkler systems in the summer to earn extra money. However, he

Students can offset high prices with textbook buyback program

By Ashley Huseman
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

With the spring semester quickly approaching, many students believe textbook prices are too high.

Larry Moeder, director of financial aid, said K-State students spend an average of $300 to $350 each semester on books and supplies.

"Textbooks are a pretty big burden because most cost over $100, and you're expected to keep them," Kristin Kitten, senior in electrical and computer engineering, said.

Kitten said she spent more than $400 on textbooks last semester. She didn't receive more than $100 back for her books because as an engineering major, she needs to keep the books as references for future classes.

"I always use my textbooks, but I think they're priced too high," Kitten said.

Dan Walter, textbook manager for Varney's and the K-State Student Union Bookstore, offered an explanation for high textbook prices.

"Some textbooks seem pretty expensive, but I think it's a function of quality of resource material that modern textbooks are," Walter said. "A hardbound book, with full color pages throughout and a full CD of information, is a lot of educational material."

SOURCE: K-State Student Union Bookstore.

Walter said students need to keep in mind that textbook prices are relative to other expenses in the economy.

"Textbook costs haven't increased nearly as much as tuition," he said. "I've been doing this for over 20 years, and things have gotten more expensive, but I think it's relative to wages and how expensive things have gotten in our culture."

When students buy textbooks, they are paying for paper costs, research, marketing and shipping, Walter said.

Walter also said higher-level classes require more expensive textbooks.

Student grows closer to Christ

By Rachel Krier
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Being born in America makes you an American. But being born into a Christian home does not necessarily make you a Christian – something Emily Golubski has learned over time.

To her, being a Christian is so much more than just going to church on Sundays, Golubski said.

Golubski, senior in elementary education, has been taught about God her whole life, having been raised in a Catholic home. However, it wasn't until her junior year in high school that she made her faith her own.

It all started when she attended the Christian-based organization, Club 121.

Red Sox player, soccer star get engaged over holiday

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

Boston Red Sox shortstop Nomar Garciaparra and soccer star Mia Hamm are engaged.

Garciaparra, a two-time American League batting champion, proposed to Hamm, the top scorer in the history of the U.S. women's national team, during Thanksgiving, the Boston Herald reported Friday.

The 29-year-old Garciaparra proposed to the 30-year-old Hamm by bending down on one knee, the newspaper reported.

The two met at a charity event in 1998 and started dating last Thanksgiving. The couple is planning to wed "sometime in the next two years."

Stewart signs with NBC

Jon Stewart is going from late night to prime time.

The host of "The Daily Show" on Comedy Central has signed a development deal with NBC for a sitcom that will begin in fall 2003.

Stewart will be the executive producer and co-writer of the series, which will star Stephen Colbert, a writer and correspondent on "The Daily Show."

Stewart will continue to host "The Daily Show," the satirical news program that won a Peabody Award and an Emmy last year.

Boss electrifies Charlotte

An appearance by Bruce Springsteen and the E Street Band warmed thousands of Charlotte residents, who've spent four days without heat and light after an ice storm. Springsteen, touring for his album "The Rising," brought his show to the Charlotte Coliseum Sunday night, telling a near-sellout crowd he was glad they'd made it despite the recent woes from the storm.

As fans cheered for a third encore, Springsteen teased them, joking with guitarist Steve Van Zandt he thought they should send fans home to their cold, dark houses while he and the band returned to their luxury hotel.

Springsteen eventually relented, and he and the band played another two songs, closing with "Santa Claus Is Coming to Town."

Copperfield hospitalized

Magician David Copperfield was taken to a hospital after stopping midway through a performance, his tour spokesman said.

Copperfield, 46, was doing the second of three scheduled shows Sunday at the Jubilee Auditorium in Edmonton, Alberta. The 4:30 p.m. show and an evening performance were canceled to allow doctors at the University of Alberta Hospital to perform medical tests.

"He was up until 4:40 a.m. rehearsing on Saturday after doing three shows," said agent Phil Lobel, who's based in Los Angeles. "Copperfield maintains a physically demanding schedule of more than 500 shows, which clearly took its toll today."

CHRISTIANITY | Students find places to worship

of having a personal relationship with Jesus," Golubski said. "I had marked the box saying I wanted a personal relationship with Christ because I thought that's what Christians were supposed to do. But God used that to plant a seed in me, and I began to ask questions about Jesus."

Golubski continued to be involved in Christian organizations during high school and searched for the same kind of group when she came to K-State.

At first, the search did not look hopeful. Golubski recalled hating the first few months of college.

She said she felt lonely and missed Christian fellowship. That changed when her old swim coach recommended Navigators, a Christian student organization.

Though it took her a little while to feel at home, Golubski has been a part of Navigators ever since.

This transition, from Catholic to non-denominational, has required Golubski to alter her concept of religion and faith.

"It switched from a Sunday morning thing to a daily thing – from being complacent with my life to desiring to know biblical truth and learning about the character of God," Golubski said.

Campus director for Navigators, Joel Johnson, said the most important decision a person has in his or her life is deciding what he or she does with the person of Jesus Christ. He said his job in the ministry is to help people make that decision.

"The focus of Navigators, or any ministry, is to help people move toward Jesus," Johnson said. "Anyone can move toward Jesus, regardless of where you are. Christians or non-Christians can still be moving toward Jesus."

For Golubski, Navigators has definitely played a role in helping her deepen her faith, she said.

Golubski said finding a place for fellowship and to worship God with people who challenge each other to grow in their faith is important to her, and other Christians echo her thoughts.

Mark Bacon, senior in architecture, has been attending Christian Challenge since he was a freshman.

He said he values his time at Christian Challenge, especially the small group part of it, because it is an intimate setting that helps him grow in his personal relationship with God. He said he encourages others to find the Christian fellowship that is right for them.

"I don't think it's a denominational issue," Bacon said. "It's where the individual's heart is at and what they need out of a church. It's where that individual feels God is leading them to be used in that setting."

Because of her personal experiences from different denominations, Golubski has developed a dream for all churches to unite in Christ, she said.

"I have this vision and this desire to see divisions be broken, to see people focus on biblical truth and not be overcome by rules and laws and traditions that were built by man," Golubski said. "I don't think there is a flawless, perfect church or denomination. Over time, the nature of man corrupts."

Next fall, Golubski will be on the hunt again for a church when she moves to the Kansas City area to student teach. For now, Golubski said, she reminds herself to focus on what's important to her.

"In a perfect mind set, all that matters is God's love for us, and all we want to do is glorify him in everything we do," Golubski said.

"We get stuck in our achievements, in school, in how many friends we have. We all fall into that, including me. The world lets us down, but Jesus is faithful even when we don't deserve it."

■ Basic Beliefs of Christians:

The Trinity: There is only one God, who reveals himself in three persons: Father (God), Son (Jesus Christ) and Holy Spirit.

Jesus Christ: The Son of God, sent down to earth as a human, to die on the cross for the sins of humans and bring them back to their correct relationship with God.

■ Holy Text:

The Bible is the holy book of the Christians. It contains the Old Testament which includes the Hebrew Bible, and the New Testament, which tells the life of Jesus and the story of the early church.

■ Symbol:

The cross or crucifix is regarded generally as a symbol for Christianity. The crucifix is the image of Jesus on the cross. If the figure of Jesus is not on the cross, it is a symbol of Christ's resurrection.

■ Holy days

Christmas, in honor of the birth of Jesus Christ, celebrated on December 25.

Easter Sunday, which celebrates Christ's triumph over death and resurrection.

HOUSING | City officials, developers looking to offer more student-housing options in Manhattan

land east of Browning Avenue and Susan B. Anthony Middle School. There, he eventually plans to develop student-oriented housing in the form of apartments, duplexes or fourplexes.

"We're not far enough along to have any timeline or numbers of units or enough information," he said. "That's a project – we just don't have specifics."

One other project that may be in the works, but not by Mike Hill, involves the area east of campus and north of Aggieville. This area would be a prime site for student housing, city officials say, because of its proximity to campus.

City administrators have presented to commissioners an overlay district proposal regarding the wording that will go into zoning regulations addressing a Traditional Neighborhood (TNO) and a Multi-Family Redevelopment Overlay (M-FRO). TNO wording is designed to discourage development of large-scale multi-family housing in older neighborhoods by establishing requirements for construction.

City commissioner Bruce Snead said the wording of these overlays should help accommodate all needs in the community.

"I'd like to see student housing be located and be provided in ways that integrated well with neighborhoods and didn't take single-family neighborhoods and turn them into multiple-house neighborhoods," he said.

Snead said he expects to see a district for the TNO by the first half of 2003, but he didn't have a timeframe for the M-FRO.

Ockert Fourie, senior planner long range for Manhattan, said that so far, there is only the proposal to change the zoning in the area east of campus, which now allows only up to four units to a zoning, to allow for multiple-family units or apartment complexes.

These are, however, proposals the planning board and commissioners still have to consider, he said.

Eric Cattell, assistant director for planning for Manhattan, said redevelopment of student housing in this area would be a long-term project and would rely on the private sector to build the housing.

Cattell said housing continues to be an issue in Manhattan. The city conducted a housing study in 2000, and found there is housing demand at all levels.

"There's a low vacancy rate that drives the prices up," he said.

"Hopefully, with additional housing being built, it will provide more choices in location and price."

Fourie said housing does cost more in Manhattan compared to national norms. In 1990, on average in Manhattan, the gross rent made up about 39 percent to 40 percent of household income, he said. The U.S. average generally is about 29 percent gross rent.

"Rent is a little higher in Manhattan," he said. "But it's reflective of the university. It's probably not fair to compare it to other communities because students don't really have an income."

With the TMOs and M-FROs, city officials do not necessarily want to separate students from other community members. They do, however, want to stabilize older neighborhoods and try to keep grade-school students close to their schools.

No matter what, housing is a continuing project in Manhattan, Cattell said.

"It's an important issue in the community for anyone who wants to live here," he said. "If we don't have enough available housing, we can't bring in new business and employees.

"It's an ongoing issue."

TO THE POINT

Understanding other religions beneficial for all

The faith series, that has appeared in Tuesday Collegians for the past five weeks, focused on presenting facts about different religions.

The stories centered around Judaism, Unitarianism, Islam, Atheism/Free Thought and Christianity. They were designed to educate you about other cultures' beliefs and practices, as well as answer why we have religion and what religion does for us.

We hope you have learned that even in the Midwest, there are plenty of religious choices available.

In a time when people are often persecuted for their theological ideals, it is important to keep an open mind.

After college, you might not be in an environment that encompasses such a vast array of religion, so you should take advantage of what K-State has to offer while it's still available to you.

We encourage you to research as many religions as you can to find the right one for you. And don't shy away from sharing your faith and experiences with those around you.

To the point is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

'Tis The Season

Practical holiday gifts should be appreciated more than frivolous ones

NASRINA BURNETT

Santa Clause has put a tube of toothpaste in my stocking for the last three years. It's not exactly the type of gift that brings out the excitement of fulfilling a long-held desire, but I have come to expect and enjoy receiving such gifts at Christmas.

Practical gifts often are overlooked and under-appreciated, but I think that anyone who is planning on giving or asking for gifts this Christmas should place some items on their list that are sensible as opposed to frivolous.

Practical gifts express attention to detail.

My mom is the primary gift selector in my family and a big fan of practicality. It always amazes me how well she knows what I need. She doesn't just give me things she thinks I might need, but pays attention to the things I regularly use.

I've unwrapped bottles of hand lotion and discovered that my mother knows my favorite brand. When the wrapping paper was torn away from a box of cereal bars. I know she was listening when I complained of not having time for breakfast.

The selection of practical gifts expresses that the giver cares so much about the recipient, that they even pay attention to the most minute of details.

Why risk wastefulness?

Buying a gift always involves a risk. What if the person the gift is intended for doesn't like it? Or what if that person receives several of the same gift? I go to a local thrift store after every Christmas to donate the gifts that I simply have no use for. It's not that I am completely unsentimental.

I simply refuse to try and find a place to keep something that I'll never use.

I have enough trouble trying to stay organized as it is. All I need is something that I don't want and can't use to add to it. Practical gifts are a great solution to this problem. If you're buying a gift for someone that you don't know well enough to be certain of their needs and desires, then don't hesitate to give a gift card.

Then that person can select something they truly need or want. If you're on the receiving end and that relative with horrible taste keeps asking what size you wear, then have the courage to tell them that you'd prefer cash or a gift card. I've often worried that asking for money sounds greedy, but there are ways of asking in a subtle manner.

Just explain the inconsistency of clothing sizes and the necessity of trying things on before purchasing. After all, it is better to explain the situation beforehand than to have to ask for a receipt so that you can return or exchange the gift later.

Sensible gift giving can free up room for frivolity.

Every year I ask my parents for my spring semester textbooks for Christmas. I know that if they don't buy them, then I am going to have to purchase them out of my pocket. By purchasing something that I need for me, they allow me to spend my money on the things that I have been wanting. My favorite frivolity is going out to dinner and a movie.

Because my relatives all give me practical gifts, I am able to reserve room in my budget for the little day-to-day luxuries that I enjoy.

Impractical gifts are great for children, but for the more mature recipient, I recommend the practical route. Older people don't need a massive quantity of "things" to unwrap on Christmas day.

The knowledge that someone cares enough to want to give me a gift means so much more than the gift itself. All I have left to say is, "Thanks for the toothpaste, Santa."

OK, so the BCS Selection Show is on ABC, and what is ABC showing? High school basketball. Get a clue, people in Topeka. Get a clue.

I thought it was weird when I found out my professor of Ancient Greek History wasn't an ancient Greek.

K-State will never go to a quality bowl game until we get a tougher schedule against non-conference teams. According to the BCS, K-State has the worst strength of schedule compared to the rest of the top-10 teams. Thumbs up to the football team for an awesome season. Thumbs down to the athletic director for not arranging a better schedule that would enhance our chances of going to a big bowl game, which would pay out millions of dollars.

I would like to see the women's coaches wear purple once. You know, purple is our color.

I'm in African-American History, and we talked about your (diversity) article in class. Almost every black student in that class said they were glad they had a white teacher because he did not bring a social bias in with him already, and he made everybody feel comfortable. This is the best class I've ever taken on this campus. The discussions, subject matter and everything is far above everything I've ever taken on this campus, and I've been here seven years.

My girlfriend and I have matching thongs. How cool is that?

Would it be mean if I told my fat roommate that gluttony is a sin?

My roommates and I are taking a survey, and we want to know, from guys, what the best type of foreplay is.

Any day now, George Bush is going to be throwing a fit, and he's going to get all childish and start threatening to use our chemical weapons on Baghdad.

The Holiday Bowl sucks.

Does anybody else have a problem with the automatic toilets at Hale Library flushing while you're still sitting on them?

You want to know why I joined a sorority? To meet people and get involved around campus. Because of my sorority, I've had numerous opportunities to volunteer, and I've made lots of great friends, who I might not have had the chance to even meet if it wasn't for the K-State greek system.

I'm from Johnson County, but you wouldn't know that unless you looked at my license plate. It's the Aquinas and Blue Valley people you hate, not the rest of Johnson County. We hate them as much as you do, so please don't confuse us with them.

Florida State sucks.

TO THE EDITOR

University should not focus on hiring 'specific types' of employee, should take time to judge knowledge, ability of the applicant to teach material to students

Editor,

The article, "Faculty's Diversity Critical," from Monday's Collegian, states an interesting point, but also shows what is wrong with focusing on supposed equal-opportunity policies for educational institutions.

It is wrong for any institution to focus much attention on hiring "specific types" of employees. The administration's attention should be solely focused on hiring qualified staff and instructors. The knowledge and the ability of an instructor to get across the material should be the only thing taken into account when hiring instructors.

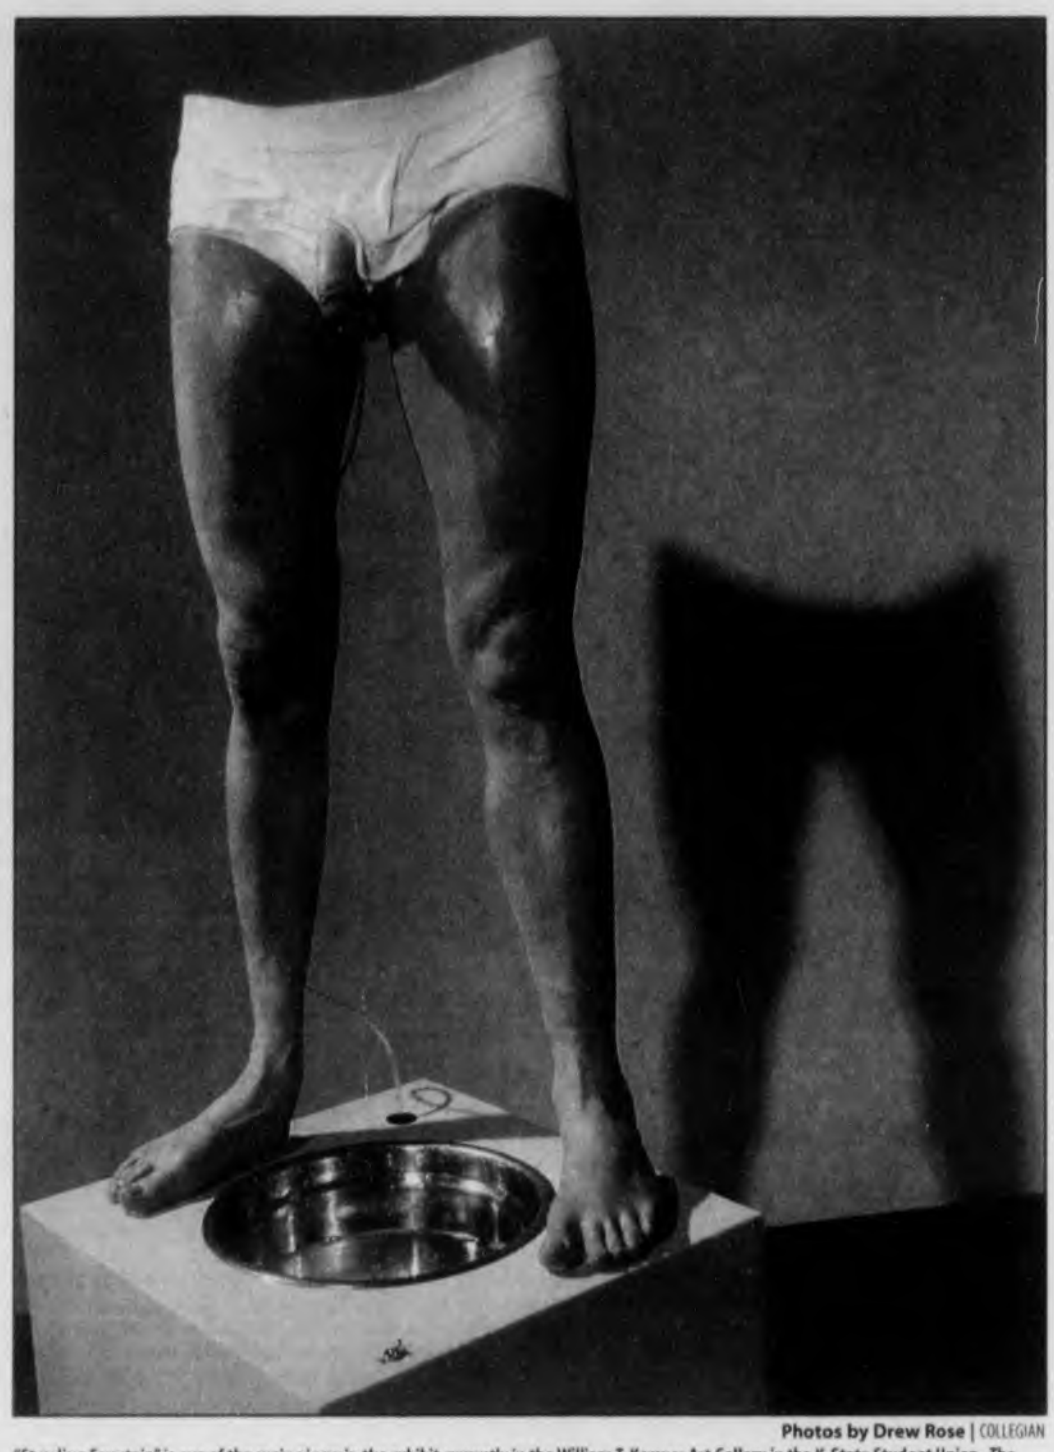
If an instructor is teaching the material of the class in a way that makes learning interesting, as well as informative, students should not find it strange that a Caucasian is teaching an ethnic-oriented class. Students should be studying the class material, not the instructor. If a student feels uncomfortable in any way, they alone have personal issues they need to work out.

The issues a student has or the subject matter of a class should not determine the "type" of teacher hired. If anything else, experience should be the only other aspect taken into account when hiring faculty.

It should be common sense by the time anyone enters college that the world is made up of numerous people, and that those people will, in some way in their lives, come in contact or work with different people. The differences in the world population should not be a reason why specific people are hired to teach classes.

Having an instructor from a different ethnic background would do less in broadening a student's world view than would the course material or mass media.

There are problems, and always will be, with employers hiring who they see fit, even if it is based on gender or race. The only way this problem will have a minimal effect on society is through education and willingness of each individual, not through policy.



The article stated: "affirmative action is to change the way an institution looks." But is appearance more important than quality?

This will be reflected in all grades of the student body, when quotas are used to measure an instructor's worth rather then his teaching ability. In the end, students and the country, suffer so an institution can change its appearance to better suit a few who can't look above and beyond the ethnicity of an instructor.

Sculptor's work sparks debate over validity of art

Photos by Drew Rose | COLLEGIAN
"Standing Fountain" is one of the main pieces in the exhibit currently in the William T. Kemper Art Gallery in the K-State Student Union. The piece is a small fountain that was molded from a human being.

By JJ Duncan
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Spending five minutes alone in the William T. Kemper Art Gallery in the K-State Student Union is difficult right now.

It isn't that traffic through the small, quiet gallery is heavy. It's because standing in the middle of the gallery can be uncomfortable right now. A large body mold of a penis urinating into a basin of water stands on one side. On the other side is a smaller fountain that simulates a urinating vagina.

Immediately, you are exposed to these prominent elements, and the fact that other people can see you staring at them. These are parts of the human body most people have been told and conditioned to turn their eyes away from.

Knowing that other people can see you looking at them can cause a nearly paranoid discomfort.

The gallery holds the Master of Fine Arts thesis exhibition of Jody Kingery-Page, graduate student in sculpture, and it features several body parts: knees, feet, armpits, penises and vaginas. All of them are realistic body molds with accurate skin tones and real hair.

For those who feel a gut instinct to walk quickly out of the gallery, Kingery-Page hopes they give the work a chance by spending time with it. In a gallery exhibition featuring genitalia, he says "it isn't about shock value."

"The reaction is more of a by-product of the work," Kingery-Page said. "My intention with using those parts of the body is to use them as what they are. Those body parts hold intense meaning.

"By using them I want to break into an area of vulnerability that I don't think you can do using most other parts of the body. But along with evoking that vulnerability, there comes a lot of sexual baggage. That's where the taboo comes in."

"Foot Study" is a foot that is made out of wax, pigment, epoxy resin and wood. The exhibit is part of Jody Kingery-Page's thesis.

Of course, there's another side to that claim. On Sunday evening, LaFayette Childs II, senior in humanities and social sciences, and Patrice Holderbach, sophomore in pre-journalism, discussed the exhibit on "Issues," a radio show on KSDB 91.9-FM. While Childs, a former student of Kingery-Page, supported the work, Holderbach argued that she was shocked by the exhibit, and questioned its artistic value.

Holderbach said she would have appreciated it if the warning sign outside the gallery had been more explicit in informing people that material of a sexual nature was contained in the exhibit.

Childs said it made a good topic for the show because people feel strongly about art, and he enjoyed seeing the show.

"I think it's art," he said. "And even if I didn't know the artist, I would still think that."

Some people just laugh the whole issue off. One comment in the gallery book suggests using "scratch and sniff" sculpture next time. Someone else noted that his "penis is bigger," while a third wanted to "meet the girl from number two."

Kingery-Page said people are entitled to their own opinions, and he doesn't want to unduly influence those opinions with his own thoughts. That's why he doesn't post artist statements with his work.

"It's part of the requirement for graduation to have a written document with your exhibit, but I don't post artist statements with my work. I never have, and I probably never will," he said. "I feel that it's really my challenge to let the objects do the talking, and if I have to back it up with a lot of text in the gallery, I'm becoming a writer, not a sculptor."

Kingery-Page also said he'd like people to take into account the technical skill the sculptures require.

Kingery-Page begins the process by making a body mold from one of what he calls a "very dedicated group of models," with dental grade alginate, a skin-safe seaweed-based rubber.

He then makes a wax cast of the mold before making a positive rubber mold that can be reused. He mixes wax with other materials until he has the right pigment and paints the wax onto the mold until it is about one fourth of an inch thick.

Kingery-Page said he has used body molds of himself as well as those of models.

"If you're putting someone through life-casting, which is a pretty intense process, it's good to have had that done to yourself because then you know what is and isn't safe," he said.

"You also know how they feel, so it's an important empathy thing. There's quite a bit of technique involved because it's a multi-step process."

Kingery-Page said he uses life casts because he didn't want the look of the genitalia to be affected by his sculpting. Instead, the life cast results in a neutral anatomical model.

This show isn't the first run in Kingery-Page has had with controversy. One of the sculptor's pieces was removed from the William T. Kemper gallery in the spring 2001 when a piece featuring a urinal was included in a group student exhibition. Kingery-Page attributed the removal to a breakdown of communication.

The artist said he has been happy with the way the exhibit has been handled this time around. Though one side of the gallery entrance has been blocked off, Kingery-Page said he is happy to have his work in the Union.

"I don't feel like I've been censored at all," he said.

"People have been very respectful of my right as a master's student to use that space to show my work, and I appreciate that."

Body Art

Jody Kingery-Page's Master of Fine Arts Thesis Exhibition will be on display in the William T. Kempter Art Gallery in the K-State Student Union until Sunday.

Betsy Wetsy Doll, is a small piece that is made out of cast iron, milled steel, poly-vinyl tubing, and hardware.

Judge upholds city's right to zone adult entertainment outlets

New York City can enforce zoning laws that limit the locations of topless bars, X-rated video stores and peep shows without having to take similar steps against movies and theater productions that depict nudity, a judge has ruled.

Operators of several topless bars had argued in a case brought last year that the city violated their constitutional rights by applying the zoning laws to their businesses, but not to shows such as "The Full Monty" and films such as "Y Tu Mamá También."

Columnist reminisces about sports' unchanging controversies

NICK BRATKOVIC

This is it for me as a writer for the Collegian.

After this column, I am but a memory for this paper.

My next step is anyone's guess.

Anyway, it has been interesting covering K-State sports the last four and a half years.

The thing that you notice quickly, and what gets ingrained in your system, is that sports don't change.

The same issues that were discussed on message boards in 1998 are being discussed still today.

Take for example the BCS formula. It was a problem in 1998, and it is today.

In 1998, K-State was trucking toward a BCS Bowl. Each Collegian Gameday counted down to Nebraska. On Nov. 14, with a Michael Bishop-to-Darnell McDonald pass, hell froze over. K-State beat Nebraska. It was a magical day.

Yet, there was more work to be done. K-State needed to beat Texas A&M to win the Big 12 Championship and advance. On a national scale, K-State fans hated UCLA five years ago. K-State was battling with UCLA for a spot in the BCS (or as I would like to call the Because of Cash Series). They needed UCLA to lose.

The Bruins did. The only thing is K-State dropped to Texas A&M, and the dream was dead. The Cats went to the Alamo Bowl.

This year, K-State sat home cheering for the Bruins again. Like a clock, the Bruins were defeated by Washington State.

Did you really expect anything different? UCLA had little chance in the game.

As a result, 2002 is another year to complain about the system and dream of a playoff. K-State might have got the short end of the stick, but it's unclear based on record and formula which team K-State should be in over.

The debates remain the same.

You see, sports don't change. The people change, but the games and the conversations surrounding them are quite similar.

Teams suck. Teams rock. Some athletes are cocky. Some are quotable; others stutter. It's life.

Coaches are never happy. They demand more from their players. Each coach has a plan. Some of them work out, but most of them don't.

Fans crave a winner. They cheer, jeer and drink. When players don't play, it's politics. When they do play, it's a beautiful system. It's funny how that works. Another thing, coaches never want a fellow coach to be fired. Fans always want a change when the team is struggling.

For their part, coaches don't change. In five years, Bill Snyder still will be scheduling scrubs in the non-conference, and he will have a national title by then. It's all the law of averages, and one year the BCS formula will work out for K-State.

Yet the system wanes on you after a while. The same old rants, tired clichés and glib quotes that yield little feeling get boring fast. That's the sports world. It's a business that never changes, one dominated by money and the will to succeed.

It has been fun watching these trends and making casual observations. As a columnist, you always think you have the answers. Fifty percent of the time, I did.

COLLEGIAN 2002 POSTSEASON FOOTBALL AWARDS

SIMPLY THE BEST

Kelly Glasscock | COLLEGIAN

Terry Pierce chases down Oklahoma State quarterback Josh Fields during second half action on Oct. 12 at KSU Stadium. Pierce has 104 tackles this season, which is just 3 short of the 107 he had in his first two seasons combined.

DEFENSIVE PLAYER OF THE YEAR

Pierce proves to be cornerstone of Cat defense

By Joel Reichenberger
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Becoming the core of the No. 1 defense in the nation can't be easy.

But doing so is exactly what earned junior linebacker Terry Pierce the Collegian Defensive Player of the Year award.

Pierce was chosen for the honor despite playing on a team that featured unanimous Big 12 Defensive Player of the Year Terence Newman. He also beat out the big man on the front line, Tank Reese, and linebacker corps partners Josh Buhl and Bryan Hickman. Pierce rose above all others and became the leader of the squad.

Pierce had a number of qualities that set him apart from the other candidates.

First of all, he excelled on the field. In 2002, Pierce kicked off his third season as a defensive starter. He put up impressive marks in 2000 and 2001 and was named a second-team freshman All-American in 2000 and first-team All-Big 12 selection in 2001.

But this season, Pierce has outdone all of his previous accomplishments.

With only the bowl game still to play, Pierce is second on the team in tackles with 104. In his first two seasons combined, he only had 107.

Pierce also gained a leg up on his teammates because of the way he headed the run defense and made big plays.

K-State has been able to become the No. 1 defense in the nation based upon its ability to stonewall opponents' running games. The heart of that effort is Terry Pierce.

At 6-foot-3 and 250 pounds, Pierce has proven to have a powerful enough punch to make big plays. When the kings of smash-mouth football – the Nebraska Cornhuskers – lined up to go for a 4th and 1 on K-State's 11-yard line, any fan with a knowledge of pigskin history couldn't imagine they would be denied.

The Huskers ran the option, and Pierce smashed through the line and tackled the Nebraska quarterback for a three-yard loss.

Pierce seemed to have his greatest success against option-type quarterbacks. With capable outside linebackers Buhl and Hickman sealing off the corners on the option, Pierce was often able to come from behind the defensive front four and make the big hit.

Against Nebraska, a traditionally option team, Pierce recorded nine tackles. He had seven against Missouri and its mobile quarterback Brad Smith.

Pierce also managed to pull out big games when he was playing against Heisman hopefuls.

He brought Colorado's Chris Brown down four times in the Cats' Oct. 5 game in Boulder, Colo., and he hit Southern California's standout, quarterback Carson Palmer, with a six-yard sack. In his only game against an option Heisman hopeful, Pierce sacked Iowa State's Seneca Wallace for 18 yards, recovered a fumble and had 11 total tackles.

The last component of Pierce's Collegian award-winning season was his off-the-field and leadership contributions.

Defensive coordinator Bob Elliott said Pierce's never-quit, optimistic attitude is quickly recognized by coaches and teammates. His boisterous mannerisms make him an ideal leader, and his undeniable enthusiasm made him a shoe-in for his second consecutive selection as team captain, Elliott said.

"He is very vocal and high-spirited and high-strung," Elliott said. "That's good because he adds a little spice to our defense that way. When he is consistent and focused and doing what he can do, Terry is about as good as it gets.

"And from what I've seen of him, Terry is always consistent and focused."

At times he leads in more subtle ways. Pierce was key in helping a 6-6 2001 squad back from mediocrity and into the limelight.

"I think it was a change in everybody's minds," he said earlier this season. "On the field, I think we take it a lot more seriously, and I think off the field, we hang with each other so much more. We're getting to the point where we understand the other person and understand what they are thinking."

He is the on-the-field heart of K-State's iron defense and the off-the-field soul of a much improved football team.

He is Wildcat middle linebacker Terry Pierce, and he is the Collegian Defensive Player of the Year.

Pierce's performance

Here is a look back at junior linebacker Terry Pierce's season

- 104 tackles, 66 solo
- 14 tackles for loss
- 5 sacks

More awards

The Collegian sports staff will hand out more postseason hardware when it names the Newcomer and Toughman of the Year on Thursday. On Friday, we will name our Player of the Year.

Kelly Glasscock | COLLEGIAN

Darren Sproles celebrates after a 70 yard rush against Nebraska. Sproles finished the season with 1,347 yards and rushed for at least 100 yards in eight straight games, both a school record. The sophomore running back averaged 6.2 yards per carry and 112.2 yards per game this season.

OFFENSIVE PLAYER OF THE YEAR

Sophomore running back has record-breaking season

By Ben Fehr
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

At the beginning of the season, everybody had questions about Darren Sproles.

Was Sproles old enough, as a sophomore, to carry the load at running back for a Wildcat squad looking to rebound from a 6-6 2001 campaign?

Was Sproles disciplined enough to master the nuances of K-State's difficult option-based running attack?

And could Sproles, at just 5 feet 7 inches and 170 pounds, put up the numbers K-State needed him to put up to be successful?

Coach Bill Snyder told the news media at the beginning of the season all of the reservations he had concerning Sproles.

"I've been asked so many different times about Darren's being tough enough to handle what we ask of him at running back," he said. "He has shown he is capable of doing what we ask of him.

"He answered those questions this summer and he answered those questions this spring. He's a tough young guy."

The season started, and Sproles put up numbers. Big time. And as the season wore on, Sproles got better.

He started rushing for 100-yards plus a game, and people started to take notice. But they still couldn't stop him.

When it was all said and done, as the Wildcats dismantled Missouri 38-0 at Columbia, Mo., in the last conference game of the year, Sproles had rushed for at least 100 yards in eight straight contests – a school record.

Sproles' 1,347 yards for the season also broke K-State's single-season rushing record.

MLB | Glavine officially a Met

Tom Glavine has spent much of his career trying to prevent the New York Mets from winning.

Now, the Mets are counting on Glavine to reverse two years of disappointment.

Glavine, one of the biggest free-agent acquisitions in Mets history, was officially introduced Monday after taking a physical. He agreed last week to a $35 million, three-year contract. The deal includes an option for a fourth year, based on innings pitched, that could make it worth $42.5 million.

The 36-year-old Glavine had spent his entire 16-year major league career with the Braves.

Media | Arledge remembered

ABC News chairman Roone Arledge was remembered Monday by colleagues as an inspirational boss and a pioneer who transformed sports television.

Arledge, who died Thursday of complications from cancer at 71, created such shows as "Monday Night Football," "Wide World of Sports" and "Nightline."

The 36-time Emmy winner, who was president of ABC News and Sports for more than a decade, was cited as one of the 100 most important Americans of the 20th century by Life magazine in 1990.

NCAA | Iowa's Banks selected as AP Player of the Year

For a guy who never started a college football game before this season, Iowa quarterback Brad Banks caught on pretty fast. Not only did Banks become the nation's top-rated passer, he also led the Hawkeyes (11-1) back to national prominence and into the Orange Bowl.

Other than two fumbles in a loss to Iowa State, Banks was nearly perfect in No. 3 Iowa's winningest season ever. The miscues did nothing to take away from his sensational play, and Banks was chosen Monday as The Associated Press College Player of the Year.

NFL | Redskins' defensive coordinator interviews for Michigan State job

Washington Redskins defensive coordinator Marvin Lewis interviewed for the vacant Michigan State head coaching position and said Monday he will quickly decide whether to take the job.

Lewis flew to East Lansing, Mich., immediately after the Redskins' 27-21 loss to the New York Giants on Sunday. He met with Spartans athletic director Ron Mason and university President Peter McPherson.

Lewis did not say whether he was offered the job, but he indicated he could announce a decision as early as Tuesday.

NCAA | UCLA fires coach

Bob Toledo was fired by UCLA on Monday after two lopsided losses to finish the regular season.

Toledo coached UCLA to a school-record 20-game winning streak in 1997-98, but the Bruins have gone 24-24 since and have lost four straight to rival Southern California. Toledo guided UCLA to a 49-32 record in seven seasons, the third-most wins for a football coach in school history.

SCHOLAR | K-State continues to be represented in Rhodes award

adviser, said he has worked with Champion on several scholarships, which allowed them to get to know each other pretty well.

"I felt for some time that he was the kind of student who could merit this kind of award and was happy to see the Rhodes Trust recognized those qualities in him as well," he said.

Hohenbary said Champion called Saturday night when he found out he won. He said Champion sounded thrilled and relieved it was over.

"Although my emotions weren't as intense as his, I felt the same. I was very happy for him," Hohenbary said.

Wefald said the Rhodes Scholarship is an extraordinary award to an extraordinary young man.

"He was a finalist for the Truman Scholarship and didn't get it. He applied for the Marshall scholarship and didn't get it, and he didn't give up," Wefald said.

"That's why I like him. That's a good lesson for anybody. You don't win them all, but the people who make it to the top are the people who never give up."

Champion said it was very frustrating not getting the Truman Scholarship since he was named a finalist.

"It's so hard to spend your entire extracurricular life planning on a career totally dependent on a long-shot scholarship, but you just have to dust yourself off and move on," Champion said.

Champion is the seventh K-State student to receive the Rhodes Scholarship since 1986.

K-State students are second in the nation among 500 public universities in the number of Rhodes Scholarship winners since 1986. The University of North Carolina Chapel Hill is the No. 1 public university in recipients, said Hohenbary.

"The fact that we've won seven since 1986 means we've taken far more than our share, if you would have just distributed them out evenly," he said.

Hohenbary said the Rhodes Scholarship application is one of the simplest. The application includes a 1,000-word personal statement, a two-page list of accomplishments, five to eight references and the application page.

"However, the fact that the application materials are so limited and straightforward means the candidates work exceptionally long and hard polishing the materials to make sure they are the best representative of their future plans and qualifications," he said.

Champion graduates on Saturday and, as a recipient of the Rhodes Scholarship, plans to get a doctorate in materials chemistry at Oxford University.

AIRPORT | Cook juggles multiple responsibilities

said he thought it was time to stop letting his parents help pay for his schooling.

"It's a pride thing," Cook said of taking full financial responsibility for his final year.

A scholarship and salary accompany the responsibilities of student body president, but Cook said that would not be enough to prepare for his Jan. 3 wedding. He took on the job at the airport in September.

Hoke said she understand's Cooks desire to stay busy.

"It will be a relief when he's done, but we've talked about it, and it's his personality," she said. "We both want to do a lot, so I don't really see it ever being one thing.

"I admire that about him."

Cook said he plans to work at the airport through the summer, but anything is possible. After graduation, he probably will stay involved in a number of activities, whether he gets a job, joins the Peace Corps or goes to graduate school.

"I could be a workaholic," he said, "if I like my job. If you like your job, then you don't have to worry about getting off at five o'clock every day."

Hoke said she understands Cook's responsibility, but that it is more important that he enjoy what he is doing.

"It will be nice to have some extra money. But he loves being out there," she said.

Sometimes functioning on only three hours of sleep, Cook said he has developed a respect for students who have to work multiple jobs to afford college.

"I feel for people who work full-time and go to school," he said. "You develop better organization skills, but it's a strain on your energy."

Cook said he thinks working multiple jobs could become a growing trend among students. Cook enjoys the perks of his second job, though, he said.

"I will mandate that I will pay for at least part of my kid's college," he said, "if he works at an airport so I can travel for free."

SPROLES | Sophomore running back proves himself

Michael Smith said the Wildcats will continue to expect big games, and big numbers, from Sproles in the future.

"I expect Darren to do that, and I think he expects that of himself," Smith said. "We expect nothing but great things out of him."

Offensive coordinator Ron Hudson said calling the plays is easy when Sproles is on the field.

"Pound for pound, he's awesome, no question," Hudson said. "This kid is downhill, but at the same time, he'll break your ankles unless you break down real good. He brings that to the table.

"When you have a running back that can go for that many yards, a lot of people are pointing their fingers at me and giving me credit," he said. "Shoot, it isn't that hard when you have a guy like that in the backfield."

Sproles averaged 6.2 yards per carry and 112.2 yards per game this year. And he did it in one of the nation's best defensive conferences.

Linebacker Terry Pierce said Wildcat fans have seen only a glimmer of Sproles' true capabilities.

"He'll probably be the best back in the Big 12," he said.

"What you all have seen is nothing. I've seen him do even more amazing things on the practice field."

Sproles likely has a good deal left to show K-State fans, but in what might have been the defining moment in his career, Sproles showed them plenty.

With a streak of six 100-yard performances on the line against Nebraska on Nov. 16, with less than three minutes left in the game, Sproles earned 86 yards for the game.

Sproles promptly took a pitch from Ell Roberson, broke down two defenders, and bolted 69 yards for the yards, and subsequent touchdown, that kept his streak intact.

Snyder said he was happy to see the streak continued but added that streaks were the last thing Sproles cares about.

"As I've said so many times about Darren," he said. "In that stretch where we were struggling a little bit, he's right there, looking up, tugging at you, saying, 'Coach, I'll do it. I'll do it. I'll do it.' And he doesn't care about the hundred yards.

"What he cares about is what can he do to make this team better and more competitive."

For all of this, Sproles is the choice for the Collegian's Offensive Player of the Year.

BOOKS Students take advantage of used textbooks

"As you get to higher levels, more specialized books, they have higher price tags because publishers still want to produce high-quality books, but they sell a smaller number," Walter said.

As a way to cut back on textbook costs, some students take advantage of the textbook buyback program.

"The buyback program has been worth it, but I probably get back less than half of what I paid for," Kitten said.

Walter said the bookstore uses the buyback program as a way to offset burden of textbook prices.

"Textbook prices are high, and that's why we are so aggressive with our used book programs," Walter said.

The money that students get back for their used textbooks depends on whether the book will be used in the upcoming semester, Walter said. The anticipated release of a new edition also affects the resale value, along with the store's inventory that is already on hand.

Walter suggested students keep their receipts when buying books and bring the books back if they need to.

"Two weeks into class, you have the option to bring anything back if you need to," Walter said. "There's no risk if you keep your receipt. Try to buy used textbooks, and try to sell them back."

Fire damage minimal

By Sarah Rice
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A fire Tuesday at Thomas Sign Advertising, 1515 Fair Lane, caused about $25,000 in smoke damage to personal items, the fire department said.

The cause of the fire, reported at 12:20 p.m., was determined to be an electrical short circuit in the hot water heater, assistant fire chief Jerry Snyder said.

The fire started in a bathroom ceiling in the southeast corner of the building. Snyder said rolls of reflective tape stored in the ceiling caused heavy black smoke, alerting police officers to the fire.

No one was in the building at the time of the fire, Snyder said, because employees were out to lunch. The fire was reported by Riley County police officers who were driving by and saw smoke.

Snyder said the $25,000 in content damage was smoke damage to items including antique slot machines, player pianos and a jukebox.

Structural damage was estimated at $1,000.

"There is pretty heavy smoke damage to the area, light smoke damage to the rest of the building, but fire damage will be minimal," Snyder said.

Jennifer Whalen, office manager at Thomas Sign, said the damage was mostly seen in smoke damage to the walls and ceiling.

"It was pretty much the building itself," she said. "We are very lucky."

Manhattan firefighters Dale Hayden and Wayne Braun discuss the fire that occurred Tuesday afternoon at Thomas Sign Inc., 1515 Fair Lane. The cause of the fire was determined to be a short circuit in the hot water heater, assistant fire chief Jerry Snyder said.

Local charities take hit

Poor economy to blame for drop in donations, giving

By Amy Preston
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Shirley Bramhall hopes for the best each year in the annual Mayor's food drive.

This holiday season, however, Bramhall – executive director of the Flint Hills Breadbasket – holds her breath in trepidation.

As a result of a nationwide struggling economy, local non-profit organizations are finding that their donations have been coming up significantly short – and many are wary of what the future may bring.

Struggling season

Usually, the holiday season brings an increase in individual and corporate donations for non-profit organizations.

However, this year will be a different story for local charities.

"Our corporate donations are down," Bramhall said. "They're falling off and told us they need to economize and be more efficient, and we know what that means."

What it means, Bramhall said, is that significant contributors, such as Kellogg, Quaker and other donors, will no longer be able to donate food items to the Breadbasket like

County worried about underage drinking statistics

By Dan Smith
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

When it comes to underage drinking in Manhattan, Mike Watson doesn't water down the facts.

"It's a problem," the Riley County Police Department director said. "Young people are testing the water and trying to see what life is all about."

For the majority of Riley County minors, it seems alcohol is equally important to life as getting a date for the prom or learning K-State's fight song.

Cumulative RCPD arrest reports from January to October 2002 include 295 cases of minor in possession, 16 citations for furnishing alcoholic beverages to minors, 102 incidents of unlawful use of a driver's license in acquiring alcohol, and another 64 for unlawful use of identification cards.

The number of arrests is surprising, Watson said, but the number of underage drinkers not getting caught might be even more startling.

In a 2001 University of Michigan study investigating the drinking habits of America's high-school seniors, nearly 80 percent said they tried alcohol at some point in their lives. In Kansas, the figure is at 82 percent.

And in a city where social and economic vitality is fueled by a young population's

Rural communities struggle to maintain populations

Jessica Heller, graduate student in family life education, lays a sugar cookie she has finished decorating on a rack while her sister Jennifer Heller, sophomore in secondary education, waits for her to move at their parents home in Hunter, Kan. The town is losing its younger generation, including the Heller sisters, because of the lack of opportunities in the area. "I doubt they come back here after college," said their father, Michael Heller. "And we can't blame them."

Editor's note: Recent statistics show small towns are disappearing in the nation's heartland. The Collegian takes an in-depth look at why this is happening and how it affects the students and families in Kansas.

At first glance, the main street resembles a ghost town.

The streets are bare, and the buildings are run down.

But a closer look reveals a town struggling to survive. A town whose residents are strong and have an indescribable love for the small community in the heart of Mitchell County.

Hunter, Kan. – a town that refuses to die.

"I believe in commitment," said Kristin Stewart, a resident of Hunter who raised two children in the town. "I don't want to leave. This is where I made my home, and I want to stay here – no matter the size."

The town, about 130 miles west of Manhattan, consists of a restaurant, general store, two churches, a small library,

Ribbon-cutting ceremony to celebrate Calvin entrance

By Crystal Becker
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The debris has been cleared and the construction completed. After 94 years, Calvin Hall's west entrance has received a facelift.

Students and faculty from the College of Business Administration will join administration officials, engineers, architects and facilities personnel at 11 a.m. today to celebrate the completion of the newly renovated west entrance.

During a ribbon-cutting ceremony, President Wefald and Yar Ebadi, dean of business administration, will greet and recognize contributors to the project.

After the ceremony, guests may retreat to the third floor for a reception or to tour the student center.

Sondra Visser, budget director for the college, said construction on the updated entrance, which began in mid-May and was completed in early November, was badly needed.

"The west side of Calvin is actually the backside, but it is the most visible side and the most used," Visser said. "It's also located near an entrance to campus, so it's one of the first things people

BANTER AND BELLOW | Dear St. Nick

Naughty or nice, traditional letters for Santa should include beer, burgers, books, music

Submitting a list just in case

Layton: Dear Santa,

I've been exceptionally bad this year, so the most I can ask from you is to not bother coming down the chimney if all you're going to do is pistol-whip me. I would appreciate that muy mucho.

Still, I'm going to ask for some stuff anyway. This is just in case any shimmering examples of good I have done can still be seen through the murky layer of bad.

1. I'll need an unlimited supply of "Resist Temptation" burgers and pints of Boulevard Wheat from So Long Saloon.

2. I wish I had a nickel for every time a girl told me she wanted to have my babies so her children would inherit my curly hair. Heck yeah!

3. I wish I had Blind Melon's album "Nico," which I loaned to my ex-girlfriend. Peach, I know you've probably forgotten me, but I need that back. I'll even return your stereo. Hold it, on second thought ... keep it.

4. I wish I wrote the song "Wishlist" by Pearl Jam. Here are my favorite lines:

I wish I was a neutron bomb, for once I could go off.

I wish I was a sacrifice but somehow still lived on.

I wish I was a sailor with someone who waited for me.

I wish I was as fortunate, as fortunate as me.

I wish I was a messenger, and all the news is good.

I wish I was the full moon shining off your Camaro's hood.

I wish I was an alien, at home behind the sun,

I wish I was the souvenir you kept your house key on.

5. And finally, I wish I was an Oscar Mayer Wiener.

Question

What's on your holiday wish list?

You can e-mail Banter and Bellow columnists Dana Strongin, junior in print journalism, and Layton Ehmke, senior in print journalism, at banter@spub.ksu.edu.

Please dispense with the labels

Dana: Dear Santa,

It's that time of year again. I wanted to check up on my status.

As usual, I would prefer you ignore the "nice" or "naughty" designation. Some naughty things are nice, and some nice things are naughty – or just a waste of time.

Although I might seem like a complex gal, I am really quite simple. My wish list reflects that, so here are some things you could stuff in my stocking.

1. A good book to read. I can't seem to find the perfect book for curling up on the couch this break. It needs to be lighthearted but still have some sort of meaning.

2. Some new sheets. I had these really expensive soft ones, and they were so weak my foot went right through them. I can't sleep on them anymore because I'm afraid I will get stuck like a dolphin in a tuna net.

3. New eyeballs. Mine still itch a little from the pus-filled pink eye I had last week.

4. A new puppy. This might be happening back home on the Strongin ranch. I will get to play with him, but I won't be as responsible for messes as the rest of the family. It's like borrowing a little kid for a day, then returning it to its mother hungry and tired.

5. Anything related to music. This includes any type of .mp3 or new portable CD player, or just a nice pair of headphones to keep around for Kedzie lab time – oh, wait, I'm finished with that. Still, I am looking for some new music to buy, too.

6. Something ridiculously fun and goofy, no matter how small it might be. I find that, despite the fact that I could have had 500 heart attacks this semester, I didn't even develop wrinkles. I attribute this calmness to keeping a sense of humor.

And for the readers, I hope they keep giggling and guffawing, too. For those who don't celebrate Christmas, remember, Santa is all about giving. It wouldn't hurt to send him a note just in case he and the reindeer decide to respond.

Finals kits allow relatives to show support

By Rogie Dorpinghaus
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Thanks to the Student Alumni Board, K-State students may be receiving Finals Week kits, a type of care package that helps show support.

Sending a care package is an easy way to encourage a person, said Mitzi Frieling, associate director of alumni programs.

The board started the program in 1983, Frieling said.

The program allows relatives of students to buy kits consisting of food and other goodies. The profits from the packages go to the K-State Alumni Association.

"Everyone likes to get a kit, especially during Finals Week," Frieling said. "Whether made by mom or a company, it helps take off some stress that week."

Beth Ludlum, senior in agricultural communications and journalism and board member, said her care package showed support from her family and friends.

"All finals care packages are a good way to let students know there's somebody out there rooting for them and cheering them on," Ludlum said.

To ensure a finals kit makes it to the student during Finals Week, orders should be placed by Friday.

Frieling said sending a care package is a good way to supply students with food for energy during the stressful week of finals.

However, Finals Week isn't the only time care packages are available, Frieling said.

Packages can be purchased and distributed all year long.

Packages are available with different holiday themes. For example, right now there is a "Secret Santa" package available.

Not all students who received finals packages were as pleased with them as Ludlum was.

Carrie Hale, junior in social work, said she didn't use all the items in her package and would rather have had her mom personalize one for her.

"I'd rather have had a more personal one," Hale said. "I don't think it fulfilled the purpose it was supposed to be for, but it did show that my parents were thinking about me."

Even though not all students were as enthused about the contents of the package as she was, Ludlum said the care packages still serve their purposes.

"For students or parents alike, it's a good way to show fellow students they really care," she said.

Finals kit

Care packages range from $14.50 to $32.50 and can be purchased at www.k-state.carepackages.com.

Visa, Mastercard, and Discover are all acceptable payment options.

Downtown Manhattan receives facelift from restoration program

By Scot Gammill
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Lately as you walk through Manhattan's Downtown Business district, you might notice some changes as houses, apartments and office buildings are transformed.

Manhattan is a part of the National Main Street Association, which works to preserve downtowns.

"We're a main-street city," director of Manhattan Inc. Carrie Ohm said. "We want to give a great historical feel and keep the downtown area alive."

The National Historic Register is consulting with independent people who are interested in helping downtown Manhattan keep its historic touch.

The Historic Register consults with those who are interested in making changes to building that have historic value.

"There are a number of restored buildings that independent people who consult with the state historical society, and they have the intention to get on the register," Bonnie Lynn-Sherow, assistant professor of history, said. "The downtown district runs from the mall to Fifth Street to Poyntz Avenue and also a couple blocks on Fourth street."

To be considered for the Historic Register, the Manhattan Historical Resources Board will survey the space, and then a building permit is given. The state then gives consulting and advice on what would improve the area. Buildings must be more than 50 years old to be on the register.

One current project is the reconstruction of the Union Pacific Depot that was built in 1902. The Manhattan Riley County Preservation Alliance has a fund raiser called the Whistle Stop Campaign to raise a portion of the money.

"There needs to be $750,000 raised to finish the project," Lynn-Sherow said. "We have to raise $150,000, and the Department of Transportation pays the rest."

The process of raising money has lasted more than six years. The building will be used for public groups to have events. The group hopes to have the project complete in 2005 for Manhattan's 150th birthday.

On Poyntz, attorney Barry Clark has redone his office building to add to the historic feel that downtown has.

"We gutted the building and extensively remodeled 417 Poyntz office building," Clark said. "It was built in 1910, and we made it look like the original 1910 store front."

When doing a project like this, some people have the option to use some of the original materials from the building they are reconstructing.

"We were able to use original materials to make our press tin ceilings," Clark said.

Lynn-Sherow went the same route when it came to saving materials to update the buildings.

"When we were redoing our apartment buildings, we used original wood from the buildings," Lynn-Sherow said. "I'm really happy we were able to save it because now we have to have it shipped to us, and it is really expensive.

Downtown Manhattan Inc. also is working on other projects at this time.

Lynn-Sherow said every change will better the community of Manhattan.

"All of these changes make the town look better," Lynn- Sherow said. "It really is smart to do make these changes. It is good economic value. No one wants to shop in a town where houses aren't kept up and are falling apart."

A main reason that individuals are interested in doing this to their homes and businesses is because they can receive a large amount back from their taxes. If a property is on the register, they can receive 25 percent off their state tax and an additional 20 percent off their federal income tax.

"I think we will see even more improvements because people will be restoring store fronts," Clark said. "With the tax cuts, it is very much worth doing. I think there will be a lot more people occupying spaces downtown because Poyntz is really starting to move up."

Ohm also believes that that there will be more people utilizing spaces downtown, and that it will help out with the atmosphere.

"We've been trying to get individuals to take spaces, utilize second floors and do anything to help improve," Ohm said. "I think it definitely draws people in, and all the improvements will help make this a better business district."

TO THE POINT

Resist instinct to procrastinate with finals work

Finals are the worst time of the semester.

Sixteen weeks of reading, writing papers and studying, and yet your grade comes down to just one final. The worst thing to do during a time like this is procrastinate.

Many students, however, work best under a heavy deadline and produce some of the best work the night before an assignment is due. But waiting until the last minute to study isn't the wisest choice you can make this semester.

Finding just a small amount of time each day to brush up on what you've learned throughout the semester is the best way to go about studying for finals. Thinking that there will be enough time to study the night before is risky. It's this time of year that fatigue takes its toll the most with students, and it's also the time of year when cold and flu viruses are making their way around campus.

Studying in smaller intervals in order to give your body more sleep at night is only going to benefit you during Dead Week and Finals Week.

It's do or die. Your grades are on the line. Get enough grub, get enough sleep, and don't forget how important good study habits are this time of year.

LOST CAUSE

Abstinence campaigns don't stop people from having premarital sex

AMBER KOEHN

The opening verse to LaTure's 1991 hit, "People are Still Having Sex," hits the nail on the head: "Have you ever noticed that people are still having sex? All the announcement had absolutely no effect.

Parents and counselors constantly scorn them, but people are still having sex, and nothing seems to stop them."

And nothing ever will.

Sex before marriage is something many of our religions have deemed sinful, and when people are told not to do something, it makes them want to do it even more.

It's just human nature.

Preaching abstinence is a noble cause, but when humans' natural sexual urges are aroused, "nothing seems to stop them." It has been my experience that when we tell people not to do something, they are automatically going to want to at least "try" whatever it is we're warning them about.

Take the case of Erika Harold, for instance. Harold is the 2003 Miss America, and her public-awareness platform is teen abstinence. Harold is a professed Christian, and she announced her plans of promoting chastity after she won the crown.

But the Miss America pageant organizers stepped forward and vetoed her issue and wouldn't say why. Then, when Harold protested, the organizers reversed their decision but with one condition: Harold preach her message in the more politically correct theme of "teen violence."

While I commend Harold on her willingness to share her faith and personal beliefs with millions of teenagers, I have to agree with the pageant organizers. Teens might pretend to care what others have to say about abstinence, but those raging hormones are more than likely going to get the better of them.

That, or the overabundance of sex on television, in magazines and books and in movies.

When the majority of our culture relishes sex, is it really fair to expect young people to remain celibate until marriage?

It's honorable and respectable but not practical.

From a non-Christian standpoint, main motivators for remaining abstinent focus more on physical and emotional consequences. STDs, unwanted pregnancies and emotional baggage are just a few of the possible "side effects" of a sexual relationship.

This is why people and organizations that preach abstinence are doomed to fail – they neglect to cover a majority of the issues involving sex.

The Dec. 9 Newsweek cover package talks about the controversy surrounding abstinence and the effects of premarital sex. One article, "The Battle Over Abstinence," by Debra Rosenberg, focuses on Karie Hughes, the instructor of a federally funded abstinence workshop at Highland High School in Phoenix, Ariz.

Hughes uses dice and a gambling metaphor to explain to young people the consequences of having sex at an early age. Each number on the dice represents a risk – pregnancy, sexually transmitted disease, a broken heart, etc.

She also shows graphic slides of the effects of STDs.

According to the Newsweek article, more than one-third of U.S. high schools teach abstinence until marriage, and 700 abstinence programs spread the philosophy in all 50 states.

President Bush is even hoping to increase abstinence funding.

But there's more to sex education than abstinence programs that use scare tactics to spread fear and misinformation.

Significant medical groups and other supporters of "comprehensive sex education," like the Sexuality Information and Education Council (SIECUS), agree abstinence should be promoted as a first choice, according to Newsweek. But they also want to teach teenagers how to reduce their risks if they do have sex.

This is the way we should be going about educating our teens.

Though polls show pro-abstinence forces have received more political recognition, most parents overwhelmingly favor the comprehensive approach, according to Newsweek.

Though teen chastity is on the rise, it's still a good idea to inform young adults of all their options – let them choose for themselves.

No matter how persistent we are in preaching abstinence, "people are still having sex, and nothing seems to stop them."

Wonderful Wal-Mart:

Shop aimlessly to help avoid final studies

MICAH HAWKINSON

Has the crunch gotten to you? The infamous Dead Week is halfway gone, and it seems to be working so far – I sure feel half-dead.

With any luck, the trend will continue long enough to spare me the pain of final examinations. Better yet, maybe I'll expire by tomorrow so I don't waste any valuable time studying for finals.

If you're anything like me, you're looking for an excuse to get out and enjoy life away from the ol' textbooks.

Well, fear not, citizens. I have the perfect solution for you: a trip to Wal-Mart.

Remember Wal-Mart? It's that huge store down by the new Dillons. You know – the one you used to go to every weekend with your oh-so-cool freshman friends during your first month of college.

For the easily entertained among us, innumerable diversions lurk behind the retail racks at Wal-Mart. For your edification, I've provided a sample itinerary of activities for a trip to the land of Falling-Price Rollbacks and eerily anthropomorphic smiley faces.

If you follow these suggestions, I guarantee you will have a blast at Wal-Mart – or at least forget your studies for a few minutes.

- Gather as many people as possible to join you on your quest to forget how poorly you are doing in your classes.
- Go around your living area luring people with haunting siren songs like in the "Odyssey." If you don't know any siren songs, try just asking people.
- Leave. Drive the wrong direction down Anderson Avenue, because you haven't driven to Wal-Mart in ages. Get mocked incessantly by passengers.
- Arrive at Third and Bluemont. Begin to curse the stoplight.
- Finally, get into the Wal-Mart parking lot after sitting through that darned light for seven minutes. Hate the original planners of that intersection.
- Enter Wal-Mart. Ask the nice greeter for stickers for you and your friends. And your girlfriends (or boyfriends). And your fish named Robbie.
- Thank the greeter for the wonderful stickers, and accuse all of Wal-Mart's competitors of crimes against humanity. Swear to be loyal to Wal-Mart above all others. Weep with happiness at having finally found a place where people really value you.
- Go to the clothing section in order to obtain socks.
- Get embroiled in a debate about the underwear garment section. Argue that Wal-Mart should be able to sell underwear out in the open if it wants to.
- Change your mind because of your friend's argument that he would never, ever want to see anyone he'd met at Wal-Mart in any of the underwear on display. Those aged farmers over there, for instance.
- Be disgusted by friend's argument. Go to the hygiene section to get deodorant.
- Become fascinated by the argument of the extremely loud couple in the next aisle. Find yourself nodding in agreement with the woman, who refuses to let her companion control her life "like Daddy and my last husband tried to do."
- Find friends and proceed to cash registers. Strike up a conversation with the cashier, who is just working until she can sell her screenplay and move out to Hollywood "away from all these hicks." Try not to laugh at her pretentiousness.
- Return to your living space. Resume studying for finals.

Wal-Mart might seem like a simple retail store, but with the right kind of creativity, you could occupy yourself there for days on end.

That's because Wal-Mart, like everything, is mostly what you make of it. Enjoy it while you're there, then go home and realize that finals, too, shall pass.

Micah will spend the rest of the week wandering through Wal-Mart's toy section, coveting the LEGOs. You can e-mail him at mph7686@ksu.edu.

CAMPUS FOURUM | 395-4444

If smoking is banned 30 feet from every doorway, how come there's always ashtrays in them and ash buckets by them?

Hey, Layton: Maybe you should pick up the how-to-get-a-haircut-book, you dirty hippie.

I think someone should publish a book: "The Best of the Fourum."

Nichols Hall is way too far away.

There's a girl that wants to be our fraternity sweetheart, but she's not sweet, and she doesn't have a heart. What do we do?

Just a thought for a Christmas present: bars should start selling gift certificates. Wouldn't that be a great idea?

To the person who gave me that parking place: I'm saying a little prayer for you.

Yeah, so I broke my own record and made out with two boys in one week. Go, me.

To the lady who answers the Fourum: You're a fine piece of real estate, and I'm gonna get me some land.

We're not Mexican. We're from out of town.

One Korean roommate for sale: five dolla, make you holla.

Underwear is art.

I'm Jewish. Merry Christmas to me.

Lots of people graduate in eight years. Yeah, they're called doctors.

Does anyone else hate Muppets as much as I do?

Hey, let's stand on the corner and hold signs protesting war. I'm sure the president will change his mind now.

K-State tuition: $1,800. Books: $400. Watching my friend lie through his teeth to the dean and get away with it: priceless.

Uh, if anyone has found a Tanzanite ring with white gold, I would like it back please.

Quiet hours on the sixth floor of Moore Hall just aren't going to happen. Get over it, people.

Did anyone else see those girls kicking the King Hall fork after the chem lab quiz?

It's the most wonderful time of the year.

Wow, a segregated beauty pageant. Isn't it 2002?

Because it's your dog.

My male roommate just told me he got a Mary Kay makeover.

Wait, wait, wait. My supposed male roommate just got a Mary Kay makeover.

Man who passes wind in church sit in his own pew.

I would much rather do drugs than alcohol. Drugs have less calories.

My grandma sent me a big ol' box of cookies for Finals Week. She is the best grandma ever.

The Bowl Championship Series is a total joke. How else can K-State rank No. 8 in the BCS standings and not be invited to a BCS bowl? Simple arithmetic shows that four BCS bowls times two teams in each bowl equals eight. One thing's for sure: We got the shaft.

Is it bad if my roommate just decides that she'd like to cut the cheese at 7:30?

What do you do if you really like your ex-girlfriend's roommate?

This is to whoever controls the lights at East Stadium: Please leave them on until 11 so we can play football.

I'm sorry you're Irish and from Missouri.

I pay for food, gas, shelter, TV, phone, computer and internet. And I'm in a fraternity. After you subtract all that, there's no money for your friends. I make those on my own.

You can't just call into the Fourum without ridiculous amounts of funny things to say.

My roommate is a jersey-chaser.

Terence Newman: exactly how many girlfriends do you have?

Just because you wear pads and a football helmet doesn't mean you're better than everyone else.

You redshirted football players are nothing more than waterboys, and you never will be.

Update on Natural Disasters girl: she called me.

Sorority rhymes with superiority. Does that mean sororities think they're higher up and better than everyone else?

Yeah, this is a little piece of advice for finals next week: pressure makes diamonds.

Whoa, I just smelled myself, and to paraphrase John Mayer, my body is a wonderland.

CEREMONY | Calvin Hall set for ribbon-cutting

see when they drive up Mid-Campus Drive."

Visser, who is responsible for construction projects in Calvin Hall, said the asphalt driveway that once occupied the area was too steep.

"People were falling a lot in winter trying to get in and out of Calvin, so there were practical as well as aesthetic reasons for renovation."

Visser said the entrance completion is the culmination of a larger effort to improve Calvin Hall.

"We've been renovating since 1992," she said. "When we began, there were only two bathrooms in the entire building, and no wheelchair accessibility. "

Ebadi said the college has come a long way.

"Calvin was built in 1908 for $70,000," he said. "We began outgrowing the building in the '80s, and there was a lot of discussion of moving. If we would have done that, though, we would have lost the historical value and location."

Ebadi said the college's budget for all renovation costs, $3.7 million, was used to renovate the 10,000-square-foot attic space, install central air conditioning, and build and renovate computer labs, multimedia classrooms and offices.

Although there still are offices to finish, most of the renovations are complete, Ebadi said.

"The third-floor attic was full of broken tables and chairs and dust," he said. "Now, it's a student learning center with a lounge where students can sit and do homework, make presentations, work on projects or write papers."

Ebadi said such a large-scale project wouldn't have been possible without donor contributions, efforts of the administration and support of facilities personnel.

"The patience of the faculty and students has also been greatly appreciated," he said. "Now they can be proud of an academic learning environment that attracts the best and brightest faculty and students."

Gerald Carter, director of Facilities Planning and university architect, said the renovation of Calvin Hall is representative of the Master Plan for campus development.

"It's important to maintain that core historical element on campus," Carter said.

"A building like Calvin shows how, over a period of time, with a plan and a vision, you can make great things happen," Carter said. "Calvin Hall is a good example of how you can take an old building and turn it on its ear and make it into something that is, oh, so much better."

Procrastination doesn't just hamper grades; sleeping, eating patterns harmed as well

By Megan Wolke
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Procrastination.

It's a word college students know well.

"Why do things now when you can do them later," John Nesfeder, sophomore in computer and information science, said when asked what procrastination meant to him.

Michelle Bartels, graduate teaching assistant in English, said she doesn't always start work on assignments early enough, but she doesn't wait until the last minute, either.

When students put an assignment off until the last minute, they may think their professors won't notice, but Bartels said it's easy to spot procrastination.

She said papers done at the last minute usually have proofreading errors, are unorganized, and aren't very well developed.

"They read like they were slapped together," Bartels said.

But getting a bad grade on a paper isn't the only downside.

Procrastinators are more likely to have trouble sleeping, unhealthy eating habits and poor exercise patterns, according to the American Psychological Association.

The study also concluded that procrastination leads to higher drinking and smoking rates, and a habit of putting off visits to the doctor.

"Everyone procrastinates – puts off doing tasks that need to get done – on occasion," said Aaron Carlstrom, psychology intern at University Counseling Services. "Whether or not procrastination is problematic depends on the amount of interference and disruption it has in the different areas of our lives such as academic, social, emotional, and work."

With busy class schedules and active social lives, students could use some tips on how to stay away from procrastination.

Ways to keep from procrastinating include identifying what is necessary to accomplish an assignment in the amount of time given, getting an idea of what is required to complete the entire project, setting goals and breaking those goals into sub-goals. Visit the Counseling and Psychological Service's Web site, http://caps.unc.edu/Procrast.html for more information.

Rural Midwest communities disappearing as residents age, younger generation leaves

Story by Jessica Pitts ■ Photos by Nicole Donnert

Wey and Charlene Tuttle talk while bagging leaves outside the Grace Chapel United Methodist Church in Hunter. The members of the church alternate two-week shifts as church janitors, and this was the Tuttles' turn to do the job. The Tuttles, who live on the farm where Wey was born, were married in Grace Chapel 50 years ago last September.

bar and a bank that is open two half-days a week.

"The restaurant and the general store are the lifeblood of the town, Ken Stewart, Kristin's husband, said. "I feel like when we lose them that will be the end of the town."

Stewart, who has lived in the town since he was 2, remembers Hunter in its prime – a hardware store, two restaurants, a doctor, drugstore, creamery, implement dealer, two gas stations, blacksmith and two grain elevators.

"It was different back then," he said. "Different in the sense that there were more opportunities, but definitely not better."

However, the rural community faces many challenges. Despite the residents' intense love for the town, its population is declining and aging. Some wonder if it soon will be the next casualty of declining population in the more remote rural towns of the nation's heartland.

Michael Heller, a life-long Hunter resident and K-State graduate, said Hunter isn't going to attract a lot of people since it is 70 miles from Salina, Kan., the largest nearby city. But the residents who do live there have found the incentive to stay.

"We still have the basic services to live comfortably," he said. "You have to figure out what your priorities are and look for those in the community you live in. We have found those priorities here – a sense of community, a sense of family."

The opportunity to earn a larger income is not one of those priorities, Heller said.

"I am sick of hearing people talk about how poor we are out here in the rural community," he said. "We are poor farmers, but we are paying for the privilege to live here."

Those privileges – not locking car doors on main street and knowing every member of your church congregation – is important to the community of Hunter. The convenience of discount stores and pizza delivery take a back seat for many residents.

"My oldest daughter said there is no way she could come back and live here now since she has lived in a bigger community," said Nancy Wiles, a Hunter resident who raised three children in the town.

"I think it takes a special type of people to live out here. I love my community. I don't need the Super Wal-Mart or the Pizza Hut. Knowing my neighbor's name and feeling safe in my home at night is enough for me."

The desire to leave, however, might not be the problem for Hunter, whose population has dwindled from 109 in 1990 to 77 in 2000, according to the U.S. Census.

The problem is a lack of opportunities – which translates into jobs for the younger generation.

"We would love for our girls to come back here," said Lucille Heller, Hunter resident who has three children attending K-State. "But it is difficult to tell them that because I know there are no opportunities for them here like there was for us when we graduated from college."

Hunter baby boom

The population decline begins and will end with one generation. Younger residents no longer desire to return – nor are they expected to.

"Hunter is a community of generations," Michael Heller said. "After World War II our fathers came back and had children. The town was thriving then. Those children, my generation, went away to college with the expectation of coming back to Hunter.

"We did," he said. "We came back, took over the family farm and started having children of our own."

Those children, many born between 1975-85, were the product of a "Hunter baby boom," as Ken Stewart calls it.

"Everyone my age that had returned from college were having children," he said. "They grew up together."

So many children were born during that time that Lucille Hunter opened a preschool in the closed grade school.

"For a small town, we had a lot of parents who needed that service at that time," Lucille Hunter, a former second grade teacher, said. "So I provided it. After about seven years, most of the children were in school, and I closed it because of a lack of need."

Those same children went through grade school and high school together, and now most are attending college.

"When I was younger, there were a lot of kids my age," Josey Heller, freshman in journalism, said. "It was like we all grew up together."

But as those children graduated high school and went off to college, Josey, the youngest of three girls, noticed that fewer were coming back.

"My sisters and others that age left," she said. "That is when I noticed that there were very few kids left."

And the number keeps shrinking.

"Our children are not coming back and having children of their own," Michael Heller said. "We are in this new phase of Hunter, and there is no one coming in to replace those dying."

Dwindling opportunities

Ken Stewart said his father put him through college with the understanding that he would return to Hunter to start farming.

"Krisha's age isn't like that," he said of his youngest daughter. "They are looking to earn $40-50,000 a year, and you can't do that in Hunter."

Krisha Stewart, senior in park resource management, knew from an early age she wasn't moving back to Hunter once she graduated.

"I am not sure what I am going to do after K-State, but there is no future for me in Hunter," she said. "There is nothing there. Since I was little, Dad never wanted us to go into farming, and that is the only option in Hunter. It is sad, but I just can't go back."

That attitude, Ken Stewart says, explains the decrease in population.

"Without that third generation coming back, the population is going to keep getting older," he said. "It is hard to face, but it is almost something we are becoming numb to because it i happening to so many small towns i the Midwest."

The 2000 census numbers revealed that several counties in the Midwes lost people in the 1990s. The declin came even as states like Kansas, Sout Dakota, Missouri, Nebraska, Iowa an Illinois gained population from an in flux of Hispanics, attracted by work i meat packing and poultry plants.

The problem is that only a certain number of communities are attracting those new residents – ones who have the large corporations to support the number of jobs demanded.

"There is nothing like that near Hunter," Ken Stewart said. "Tiptor Manufacturing can attract some with jobs, but not enough to support a huge population boom."

The lack of jobs is just one of many dilemmas the small community faces. Family farms are disappearing, there are few health care facilities in the immediate area, and cultural opportunities seem to be in short supply.

"It is a tough sell to people," said David Procter, associate professor o speech communications who works with rural areas on communication is sues.

And a sell that seems to be getting

Matt "Mattie" Schroeder watches the television in Vera's, a bar he has owned for about a year, during a slow Saturday afternoon. The bar, owned by Vera Lewis before her retirement, was opened in 1967 and is known for its unique atmosphere. "Vera was the life of the place," Schroeder said, "she would sing and dance and make everybody feel welcomed."

The Hunter Cafe, owned by the residents of the town, is a gathering spot for the small, rural community. "The restaurant and the general store are the life blood of Hunter," said Ken Stewart, a stockholder in the restaurant. "I feel like when we lose them, that will be the end of the town."

Above: Ray Richardson, 1950 K-State graduate, drinks a cup of coffee Friday morning at The Hunter Cafe on Main Street. Some say the town is becoming a retirement community since more than 50 percent of its population is over the age of 55.

Left: Ed Davenport, a local electrician, talks about the rural community before the population decrease at Vera's bar Saturday afternoon. "We used to be a lot bigger," he said. "But now everybody is getting older and not a lot of young people are around anymore."

harder to make. For every five to seven farms that fold, rural sociologists say a small-town business closes.

"It is a historical trend that has exhilarated in more recent years," Leonard Bloomquist, associate professor of sociology, said. "There are fewer and fewer successful farms that children can take over from their parents.

"That translates into a decline of retail sectors. The mom-and-pop businesses are gone. Now you see people who will drive several miles to go to Wal-Mart."

Not shopping in the community only intensifies the growing concern that remaining Hunter businesses are facing.

"People who live in the town have to do business in the town," Michael Heller said. "It is the only way we will survive. I have left Beloit (30 miles Northeast) when gas was $1.10 and came to Hunter to fill up for $1.17.

"You have to keep the money in the community."

While the money stays in the community, residents are looking elsewhere for jobs.

"It used to be that a lot of husbands only farmed, and the wives didn't work," Michael Heller said.

"It isn't that way anymore. The women work in a nearby town, the men work a full-time job, and they are still farming. They are trying to balance two full-time jobs to make ends meet."

In fact, rural sociologists say the more dependent on agricultural a small town is, the harder the struggle will be to stay alive.

"Farms are either dying or growing," Ken Stewart said. "The farmers that are getting bigger are able to load their grain up in a semi and take it to Salina. The local co-op elevator doesn't ship as much grain, so the railroad will eventually close it."

When the co-op goes, other businesses will follow, Stewart said, including small, family farms.

"We were part-time farmers," he said. "That is all we could afford. My wife and I both worked outside the home. We eventually quit farming."

Now he is worried that as more farmers quit and their children move away, the few remaining Hunter businesses will begin to suffer.

"Without those business, there isn't much left," he said. "The restaurant is the main gathering place, and without the general store, people will have to go a lot farther for groceries."

This is a concern for the residents of Hunter because almost half of the population is over age 55.

"We just keep getting older, and driving 30 miles for a grocery store is not an option for some," Stewart said.

Graying community

A 2001 study by the Kellogg Foundation found that people across America report positive views about rural life.

But many also worry it is doomed to slip away – and they have every right to worry, according to the statistics.

In Hunter, the latest census numbers show the median age of the population jumping from 34.8 in 1990 to 55.8 in 2000 with no relief in sight. Children, ages 0-19, only make up about 16 percent of Hunter's population.

"We are becoming a retirement community," Stewart said. "The residents keep getting older, and we don't have many young people coming in to keep the town going."

However, no one seems to blame the younger generation for leaving. They understand their children have little choice.

Warren Heller, a retired farmer who has lived in Hunter for 78 years, expected his son, Michael, to return after college, but he does not expect his granddaughters to return to the rural community.

"What else can they do?" he said. "These days by the time you buy a tractor, combine and truck, you can't make it farming. It is too expensive."

He does hope they will come back someday. Maybe after they make it in the world, he said, they can come back to Hunter. But as for him, he is staying.

"I am glad I am as old as I am," he said. "It is a changing world, and I wouldn't want to change with it. We have never lived anywhere else, and I never will."

Others, like Ed Davenport, took a chance and moved away.

Davenport, a local electrician, was born and raised in Hunter. He moved to California for 14 years, but returned to Hunter to raise his two children.

"I was glad to get out of there and back to Hunter," he said. "The crime was so bad, I was afraid to send my children to school. I wouldn't leave here again. I won't make that mistake – I need the slower life."

Stepping out of the trend, his children are following their father's lead. Davenport's stepson and his two children moved to town about two months ago and his daughter returned about a month ago – all with the hopes of making a better life for their family.

And Davenport isn't complaining.

"Oh boy, that is great," he said. "We need all the people we can get here."

Katherine Roberts, a volunteer librarian for the community, retired in Hunter with her husband, Chester, in 1975. They came for the weekend to fish and decided they loved the area.

"We thought we would retire here someday, but we weren't for sure," she said. "Then we noticed this house that was up for auction. We went knowing we couldn't afford it, but it went so cheap we bought it and moved. We have been here ever since."

When her husband died in 1982, Roberts thought she might move back to Kansas City, but she quickly decided she could never leave.

The problem isn't the elderly staying, though. The farmers are giving up, and the young people are moving out, leaving the elderly in the community struggling to keep their names on the map.

"The town just keeps getting smaller," Roberts said, "little by little as we get older."

Looking toward the future

Procter said one thing struggling rural communities can do is have a clear identity about who they are and what they are about.

"They can then use that to promote themselves locally, as well as nationally," said Procter, who works with communities on finding that niche. "They need to find that unique aspect about their town, their lifestyle."

Lucille Heller said Hunter already has that unique atmosphere – it is just not visible to many others.

"The community atmosphere is strong," she said. "We are a group of people that love where we live.

"We have found what is great about Hunter, and we know others can, too."

Hoping to let others in on their secret gem, Lucille Heller founded Leadership Mitchell County, an initiative to keep rural communities in the area alive.

"It was originally activated because we were scared we were going to lose our schools due to low enrollment numbers," she said.

The foundation consists of representatives from area communities who find ways to promote their town's main street, housing and tourism.

"It is a start," she said. "It is getting people active in their communities, and that is what we need. In order to attract businesses and gain population, we must take an active role in the future."

Without that role, experts fear the values of small-town life will disappear as the rural communities wither away.

"We will be losing part of the American heritage," Procter said. "Many of our values – hard work, family ties and a sense of community – are based in a rural concept. The family farm, for example, is a very powerful image in America. When we lose that image and large corporations take over, we will also lose a lot of our sense of values."

Still, the future is hard to predict even when community members are taking active steps, Lucille Heller said.

"We can hope for the best," she said. "Hope we don't lose the communities our fathers and grandfathers worked so hard to build, but it is hard to be optimistic when the children are all moving away. I guess only time can tell."

Small towns

Between 1990 and 2000, according to the census:
- 12 rural Kansas counties lost 10 percent or more of their population.
- All but six of North Dakota's 53 counties lost residents.
- About half of South Dakota's 315 towns had either no growth or a decrease in people.
- The number of residents age 17 and younger declined in 63 of 99 Iowa counties.

Huskers' fall one highlight of season

Year-end college football reviews reveal other pitiful, surprising nuggets

BEN FEHR

What a year for college football.

This season we got to see the unraveling of college football superpower Florida, which slipped from a perennial top-five finish all the way to No. 22.

In the ACC, we got to see Florida State advance to a BCS berth with four losses. What a conference.

In the Big 10, we got to see the return of Joe Paterno to the national scene after a two-year hiatus and Ohio State and Iowa get BCS games. A good year by anyone's standards.

In the Big East, Miami continued its semi-amazing undefeated run through some of the worst teams in football. That's about it.

In the Pac 10, offense thrived, and defense didn't. Touchdowns by land and by air. If you're looking to score, the Pac 10 is the place for you.

In the Big 12, it was a doozy of a year.

We saw the unraveling of Nebraska. A 7-5 record and out of the top 25 for the first time since the last Roosevelt administration.

Frank "If only I were Tom Osborne" Solich dodged the old unemployment train this year but tied three long-time colleagues to the tracks to save his own rear. Way to go Frank. No Christmas cards for you.

Big 12 Champion Oklahoma helped identify for the nation how good the Big 12 is by dumping to Oklahoma State again and turning in a real turd in a loss to Texas A&M.

Colorado found a way to escape K-State early in the season but lost two games before and two games after to finish the regular season ranked a disappointing No. 14.

Props to Texas Tech for claiming state bragging rights this year. And props to Texas for again finding a way to get left out of the BCS after a preseason No. 2 ranking.

However, I award no props to A&M for firing good-guy R.C. Slocum in favor of mercenary Dennis Franchione. And no, it's not

K-State found its niche during the past two seasons by playing slow, methodical basketball and finding ways to win low-scoring games.

But so far this season, the Cats have been beat at their own game.

K-State (2-4) vs. Texas-Pan American (2-6)
When: 7 tonight
Where: Bramlage Coliseum (13,340)

K-State has the defense part down. Wildcat opponents are averaging 1.5 fewer points per game after the first six contests than at the same point last season.

But, after six games in 2001, K-State sat at 4-2.

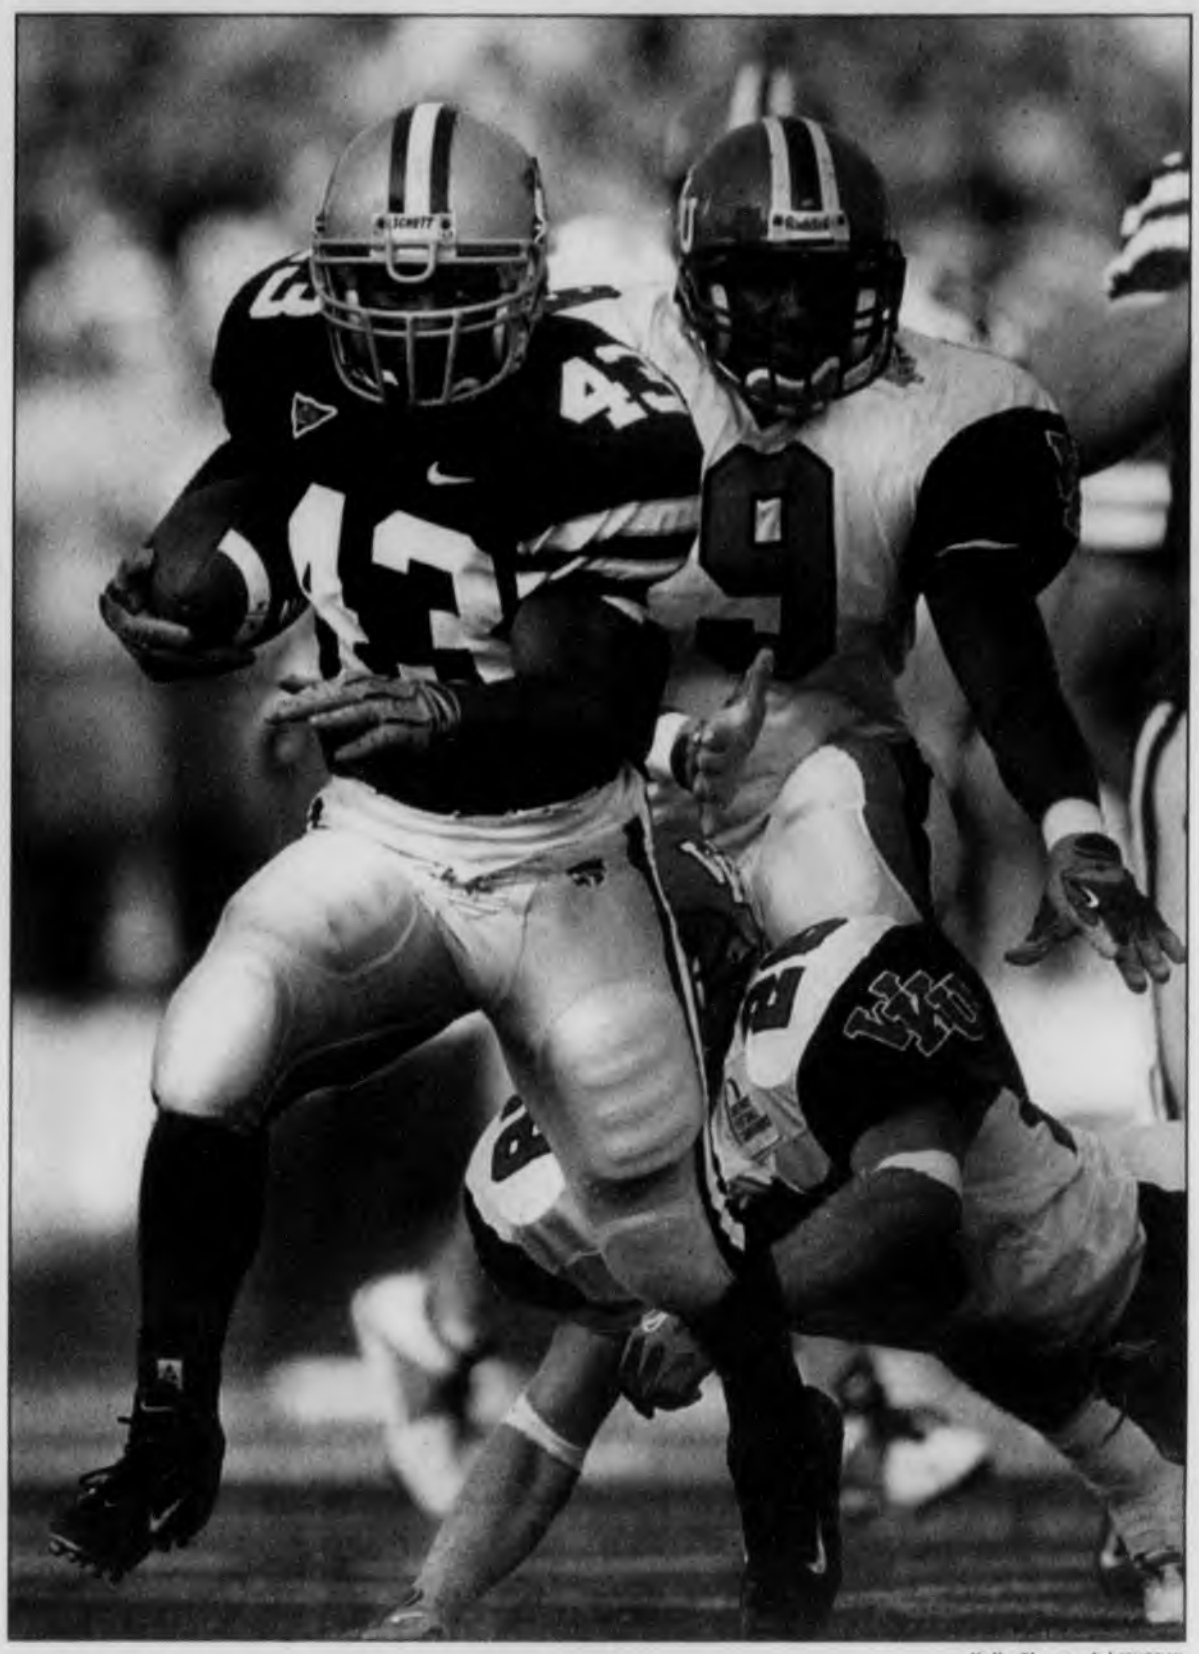
Now they are 2-4.

K-State coach Jim Wooldridge said it is the offensive end where things have changed.

The difference there is in the players, he said. While last year's team was more equipped to pull out a close victory, Wooldridge said this year's squad is more comfortable running a fast-paced game. He said the slow game his Cats mastered in 2000 and 2001 is now bleeding his team to death.

"We want, and we need, to score over 70 points a game," he said.

The Cats now average 65.1 per game.



"How we are going to generate those points is a question," he said.

"We've been in ball-control games, been in real-low possession games, and we'd like to play a faster game where we have more possessions. The style of play we're facing a lot of times – long possessions – that's kept the games down."

TOUGH MAN OF THE YEAR

Sproles silences critics' doubts of durability

By Joel Reichenberger
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Darren Sproles is far from the biggest player on K-State's team.

He doesn't lift the most weights, and he can't push many of his teammates around.

But that doesn't mean he isn't deserving of the K-State Collegian Tough Man of the Year award.

In fact, throughout the 2002 campaign, the 5-foot-11, 170-pound Sproles has proven that pound for pound, he is the toughest weapon in the Wildcats' arsenal.

So what makes this little man so tough?

It's small stature combined with his electric moves that make him stick out. But what makes him a man of iron is his remarkable durability despite his size.

A college football season can be a grueling affair for a running back. This season alone has seen several of the Big 12's best backs go down. Colorado's Chris Brown missed the last two games of the season, and even backup Bobby Purify couldn't take the heat.

Eleven, 12, even 13 straight weeks of brutal hits and savage warfare have taken the toll on countless young men trying to gain fame on the gridiron.

But Sproles didn't have much trouble in 2002. He blitzed into the

NEWCOMER OF THE YEAR

Snyder's gambles pay off in touchdowns with Saba

They call them Nick, Vic and Thick.

Senior Nick Hoheisel (230 pounds), freshman Victor Mann (230 pounds) and freshman Ayo Saba (260 pounds) make up K-State's "jumbo" package, a goal-line set that is geared toward power.

Coach Bill Snyder calls the formation a gamble.

"That set is primarily used for goal-line situations," he said. "You're just trying to get the bodies in there that when there is a pile up, the pile falls forwards instead of backwards."

As the nation's second-ranked offense, K-State found itself in goal-line situations a number of times this season.

Saba, the man K-State chose to give the ball to most often in those situations, is our Newcomer of the Year.

Drew Rose | COLLEGIAN

Running back Ayo Saba evades a defender from Eastern Illinois in the 63-13 win against the Panthers on Sept. 14.

Saba scored eight touchdowns for the Wildcats this season and racked up 129 yards in doing so. And, as you might expect, Saba never scored from more than 13 yards away from the endzone.

The call of "Ay-ooooooooo!" was heard reverberating through KSU Stadium quite a bit this season. Saba touched the ball 38 times this season and scored on eight of those carries. It's quite possibly production at its greatest.

Saba said the comparisons to former big-man Joe Hall, as well as other Wildcat big backs of days gone by, are starting to roll in, and added that they don't mean anything to him.

"I don't really like to compare myself to the other guys," Saba said. "Those guys have already made such big names for themselves in this program, and I'm just starting out.

"I just hope I can do as much as possible. I just hope I can contribute and make a name for myself."

K-State may be quite fortunate that Saba is choosing to make a name for himself in Manhattan. He

MLB | Rose discusses with Selig a possible return to the majors

Pete Rose met with Commissioner Bud Selig in Milwaukee two weeks ago to discuss the career hits leader's possible reinstatement to baseball, according to news reports.

Nothing was agreed to during the meeting, including whether or not Rose would be reinstated, which would make him eligible for induction to the Hall of Fame, ESPN.com quoted unidentified sources as saying.

Since the meeting, there have been subsequent conversations between representatives of Selig and Rose, and proposals have been exchanged, ESPN.com reported.

WXIX-TV in Cincinnati, also quoting unidentified sources, reported that Rose and former teammate Mike Schmidt met with Selig.

Rose told the TV station through an unidentified friend that he would have no comment.

Big 12 | Nebraska's Solich receives boosters' vote of confidence

In these hard times for Nebraska football, one thing coach Frank Solich can count on is the support of the team's largest booster club.

In a statement released Tuesday by the Touchdown Club of Nebraska's executive committee, the 3,500-member organization pledged "unqualified support" for Solich.

The Cornhuskers, at 7-6, had their worst regular season since 1961. They play Mississippi on Dec. 27 in the Independence Bowl in Shreveport, La.

The Touchdown Club's executive committee adopted a resolution in support of Solich on Thursday — three days after Solich fired three of his defensive assistants and removed himself as the team's offensive coordinator.

Kentucky coach Guy Morriss is set to become the second Southeastern Conference football coach in a week to jump to the Big 12.

Morriss will be introduced as the replacement for fired Baylor coach Kevin Steele during a news conference Wednesday in Waco, a source close to the Bears program confirmed Monday night.

The source, speaking on condition of anonymity, said Morriss was on the Baylor campus Monday before returning to Lexington, Ky., where he announced his resignation as the Wildcats' coach.

Kentucky athletic director Mitch Barnhart confirmed the resignation Monday night, saying only that Morriss, a Texas native, resigned to take another coaching job.

Cox, 28, batted .254 with 16 home runs and 72 RBIs in 148 games this season for the Devil Rays.

Painting Society conducts 1st showing to gain experience, raise money

By Adam Lee
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State Painting Society may be less than a year old, but it's taking steps to ensure an active future.

The society is having its first show at Java Espresso and Bakery in Aggieville. The show is intended to give members experience and to raise money for the society.

The artists involved with the show are donating a portion of their sales to the society in hopes of bankrolling future trips to museums and galleries in Kansas City.

Nancy Morrow, assistant professor of art and adviser to the society, said the show features 20 works from society members. Although all of the pieces are considered paintings, she said the artists have used a variety of styles and materials.

"There's a nice variety and a lot of energy," Morrow said. "You can really tell that there is some serious painting going on in this town."

Morrow said that when choosing pieces for this show, students had to consider what they would need to keep for their BFA shows and what was too intimate to sell.

"It's a new experience for a lot of them," Morrow said. "You've got to make some tough personal decisions. It's hard to get used to letting go of good art."

This show marks the first time that James Taylor, junior in art and member of the society, has put one of his paintings up for sale. Taylor said selling a painting for the show was appropriate not only because it would benefit the society, but also because it would help thin his expanding portfolio.

"As you start compiling pieces, you end up putting some of them in the closet or wherever, and it comes to the point where you just have to let the art go," Taylor said.

Getting rid of old artwork wasn't a concern for Rose Woolsey, senior in fine art. Woolsey said she wanted to show some of her paintings, but felt none of them were fully complete. So, Woolsey decided to use an older painting of a landscape that she felt strong about.

"The painting has good composition, and there's a lot of different colors that make it visually interesting," Woolsey said.

Woolsey said that even though she is fond of the painting, she won't miss it that much if someone decides to buy it.

An untitled piece of artwork hangs at the back of Java Espresso and Bakery.

"I did the painting to sell it, so I figured, 'Why not now?'" Woolsey said.

The society is focused on diffusing artistic ideas and techniques among its members, Taylor said, and this show is a good vehicle for that cause. He said artists can learn a lot by having their work hung alongside other artists'.

"You can compare each other's work and see what things make them successful and get new ideas," Taylor said.

Brother Bagman to play 1st Manhattan show Friday at Pat's

Brother Bagman
When: 10 p.m. Friday
Where: Pat's Blue Rib'n Barbecue

Playing jams with a three-piece band isn't easy, but Brother Bagman is up for it.

"You have to show your true grit," bassist Matt Stoulil, Kansas City, Mo., said. "The drummer and I have to keep it really solid, but add some nice fills and funky bass lines. It's a little difficult with three of us, but we like the challenge."

While the Kansas City band incorporates jams, Stoulil said they are a rock band influenced by the likes of Widespread Panic, Wilco and Radiohead.

Brother Bagman will be heading into drummer Cole Harvey's home studio next week to start work on its first full-length album.

"Cole and his dad built a nice home studio, so we figure we'll hibernate and spend our spare time there, laying down some tracks," Stoulil said. "We've got a couple of demos. Now we figure it's time to go in, roll our sleeves up and make an album.

"We've been practicing a lot, and now we're ready to get in the studio, and put together a corporate face for band with CDs and T-shirts and that kind of thing."

Stoulil said the band has worked up a strong catalogue of songs, many written by vocalist and guitarist Victor Kerr. As far as the covers, the band tries to keep them eclectic by playing songs from Cake to Bob Marley to Ween.

Stoulil is originally from Norman, Okla., where he got to know the band Sun Cured Red, another favorite at Pat's which will play there Saturday.

Friday will be Brother Bagman's first time in Manhattan, but Stoulil said they have played plenty of college towns since they started gigging about 10 months ago. College towns offer convenient venues for bands since the towns are condensed in one main area, such as Aggieville, he said.

But traveling to those towns means plenty of drive time.

"The other guys are great. We just click and work really well together," Stoulil said. "I haven't played in a band that feels this good in a long time. We don't mind joking around with each other, which is good when we have to spend four hours in a van together."

Tonight, when Wooldridge and the Cats face off against Texas Pan-American, the team will try to play a fast-paced game.

The Cats' success may boil down to the number of scoring chances they get, Wooldridge said.

"They're going to come in, and they're going to change defenses," he said. "We're going to see a lot of zone."

In order to score more, Wooldridge said K-State will have to learn to take better advantage of each possession, and every player has to contribute quality minutes.

It will take quality minutes from everyone for the Cats to get back on track this season, Wooldridge said.

He said the team needs to slow down, concentrate and become more comfortable playing together in order to have a successful December.

"December is a big big month for us," he said. "We've a lot of home games coming up, and we have to build our season right now. Our season will get more difficult as we go. We have to build confidence now. We have to play better now so that we can play better in January."

SPROLES | 'Tough nut' turns in record effort, leads Wildcat offense

land of giants 216 times in the Cats' 12 regular-season games. He gained 1,347 yards trying, and he did not once leave the field with an injury.

Sproles used that consistency to set both the K-State single-season rushing mark and consecutive 100-yard-rushing-games record. Late in the season, Coach Bill Snyder said Sproles' ability is not as impressive as his persistence.

"I don't think it's any records he has set," Snyder said. "It's just the fact that he has remained on the field, that he's carried the ball as many times as he has, and he's still playing. That is what speaks to his durability.

"He's a tough nut," Snyder said after Sproles tore apart the Nebraska Cornhuskers.

Sproles didn't wear down or get injured. In fact, he got better. His string of 100-yard games started with the Big 12 opener and reached a pinnacle in the 11th game against Nebraska, when he ran the ball 22 times, gaining a career-high 159 yards to go along with three touchdowns.

Sproles rattled off four straight 120-yard games against Colorado, Oklahoma State, Texas and Baylor. That streak could have gone further had he not sat out much of the KU and Iowa State games. He finished with the third most yards in the Big 12, behind only Brown and Oklahoma's Quentin Griffin.

Sproles' consistency on Saturday's won him the Collegian Tough Man of the Year award, but his consistently stellar attitude didn't hurt, either. Snyder said his starting running back not only shows determination on Saturdays – he shows it all the time.

"What I like about him is his diligent work habits and his toughness," he said. "I like his sense of team. I like all those intrinsic things about him. I think those things really bring his talents front and center. There are a lot of people with that talent but don't play quite as well as Darren."

Sproles is the most consistent weapon the Cats had this season. He faced some of the toughest defenses in the nation and weathered hits by men twice his size. He answered critics' questions about his size, and in the end, he has always come out smiling.

For his attitude and his persistence, for his numbers and his durability, Darren Sproles is the Collegian's Tough Man of the Year.

Sproles' season-long roll

Here are the top-five performances by running back Darren Sproles on the year.

- Nov. 16 versus Nebraska 159 yards, 3 TD's
- Oct. 19 versus Texas 136 yards
- Aug. 31 versus Western Kentucky 135 yards, 1 TD
- Oct. 12 versus Oklahoma State 130 yards, 1 TD
- Oct. 26 versus Baylor 124 yards 1 TD

was considered by many to be the premier fullback prospect in the country in 2000.

As a senior at Highland High School in Blackwood, N.J., Saba rushed for 1,335 yards and 15 touchdowns. Of those, 1,100 came at tailback.

In one game during his senior campaign, Saba carried the ball 30 times on the way to a 328-yard, four-touchdown effort.

The numbers Saba showed he could produce brought some pretty big names calling, and Saba eventually chose K-State over Nebraska, Iowa, Wisconsin and Miami (Fla.).

Offensive coordinator Ron Hudson said he is one person who was happy to see Saba come to Manhattan in 2001 (a year in which Saba redshirted).

"He's a load, he's got legs the size of trees, and he can run," Hudson said.

"A tough guy to tackle, to say the least. I'm glad he's on our side."

When Saba ditched the red shirt in favor of purple and white ones this year, K-State didn't waste much time getting him the ball, handing Saba the ball twice for two touchdowns in the season opener against Western Kentucky.

Snyder said he was pleased with his freshman fullback's opening performance as a Wildcat.

"I was pleased with his play," Snyder said.

"He ran aggressively and part of those difficult yards were his doing.

"He didn't have to go very far, but his effort made a difference. Ayo is a hard back to tackle. And in that environment, it would be a little tougher. He stays on his feet well, and I have confidence in him."

Saba said getting the first Wildcat touchdown of 2002 was a nice way to start a career.

"It's a good feeling to have the first touchdown of the season," he said.

"As a rule, some of the credit goes to the O-line and the guys that blocked for me. They really opened it up and gave me the opportunity to get in there."

Saba added that as more opportunities and touchdowns come along, his focus will be on helping K-State become a better football team.

And now that he's not a newcomer, he will have to play even more like a veteran.

"I just want to be able to contribute as much as possible," Saba said.

"Whatever I can do. I just want to practice hard every day and contribute as much as possible."

NON-PROFIT | Manhattan-area charities experience lower donation rates driven by economic struggles

they have in the past.

As a result, the Breadbasket, which heavily depends on food and monetary donations, will take a deep cut in its food supply.

Ken Scroggs, executive director of the Big Brothers and Big Sisters of Manhattan Inc., said this year has been an especially difficult one for raising funds for his organization.

Each March, Big Brothers and Big Sisters hosts a Bowl for Kids' Sake, an annual event that raises money for the organization.

With a budget of about $160,000, about 65 percent of these donations go toward the staff payroll, while the remaining percentage pays for various organizational costs, such as bills, printing fees and building rent.

"The economy hasn't been stellar the last couple of years," he said. "Last year, they were pulling in, and this year, donors are pulling way back."

In addition to the economy, Scroggs said he believes it relates to the Sept. 11 attacks.

"People gave lots of money for 9/11, and you pretty much wrung a lot of people out," he said.

Fund-raising dilemmas

According to for the Society of Nonprofit Organizations, a non-profit organization strictly uses profits to advance its programs.

Therefore, donations are crucial to the development and continuance for such programs.

Ann Jones, administrative assistant for the United Way of Manhattan, said the organization strongly depends on its one fund-raising event of the year.

"We try to keep it to one event," she said. "September through November is when our big push is."

However, this November, Jones said the non-profit organization took a significant hit in its campaign, coming up almost $50,000 short of its goal.

Fortunately for United Way, last year's campaign exceeded the initial goal and carried into this year, Jones said.

"That will help this year's campaign, since we don't want to cut anybody we help," she said. "If we fall short, depending on how much it is, we sometimes can use money in reserves, but that's not a whole lot of money."

Like the United Way, Big Brothers-Sisters has a backup plan to the economy's spiraling downfall, as well.

"Unlike other organizations, we have joined our state associations, and they're willing to help us out through this tough time," Scroggs said. "We still have to make ourselves viable, but it does help."

Moreover, Big Brothers-Sisters applies for numerous grants from foundations and organizations each year.

After a large increase in donations following the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, the American Red Cross has experienced a lack in all areas of contributions.

"We accept all kinds of donations, certainly money as well as gifts," said Clay Myers-Bowman, executive director of the American Red Cross Flint Hills Chapter. "This year, with the tremendous impact on the economy, some people are giving less of these things, while others are not giving at all."

Glimmer of hope

Although the year is looking grim for many non-profit organizations, Bramhall said the Breadbasket, like other organizations, will survive with more food drives and community involvement.

"We're able to take what the donors can give us and stretch it as far as they can go," she said. "We try to do the best we can with what we get, and it's going to be a tough year.

"But if we're low, we'll incorporate more food drives and more ways to get the community involved. I'm sure together we can do this."

Similarly, Scroggs said Big Brothers-Big Sisters are prepared for the year ahead.

"I think it's a challenge, but the real issue is I believe in our program so much and its essential part of this community," he said.

"We can make it work, and we have to make it work for our kids. That's all there is to it."

In addition, Bramhall said the state of Kansas is essential to the future donations of local organizations.

"It's neat because in the Midwest, it seems that communities and families rise to the occasion and help their neighbor, even though donations are down."

UNDERAGE | Statewide statistics cause concern for officials hoping to curb underage drinking in Riley County infatuation with alcohol, Watson said Manhattan is a powder keg for underage drinking.

"It's going to happen," he said. "With that going on, we need to understand young people are going to do this, so let's help them do it in moderation."

That's easier said than done, Watson admits, but everyone plays a part in seeing that Riley County minors get the message.

"I'm not one that believes you can just go say, 'Don't drink,'" Watson said. "It has to be education combined with enforcement, because we can arrest people and write them tickets all day long, and we'll run out of tickets before we run out of people to give them to."

Lawmakers have tried strong-arming minors before.

In 1997, Kansas adopted the Zero Tolerance policy, making it illegal for minors to operate motor vehicles with a breath or blood alcohol content of .02 or above.

The Zero Tolerance law also requires a 30-day driver's-license suspension for persons under 21 found to be in possession of alcohol.

But, Watson said, intimidation hasn't done much to curb the problem, especially since many minors aren't well-versed in the law.

"I don't believe the education is out there," he said. "If you talk to 100 people, there may be five that even know that law even exists."

The state recognized those odds weren't promising, and in 1998 awarded $360,000 in block grant funding through the Kansas Department of Transportation to address underage drinking in communities.

The "Care About Underage Drinking; Make the Right Call" campaign was developed using funding from the grant to educate all Kansans about the dangers of underage drinking.

Patrice Pomeroy, assistant bureau chief of traffic safety for KDOT, said it's too early to analyze hard facts, but the department has a good feeling.

"We would like to think we've raised the awareness a bit," Pomeroy said. "It's still new, but our mission is to prevent underage drinking."

A study conducted by the Regional Prevention Center this year found that Riley County youths might not be responding.

According to the study, Riley County youths have their first drink at 12, begin drinking regularly at 14. Moreover, 38 percent of high-school seniors consumed five or more drinks at one sitting at some point during the two weeks prior to the survey.

That is cause for concern for community activism groups like the Little Apple Task Force.

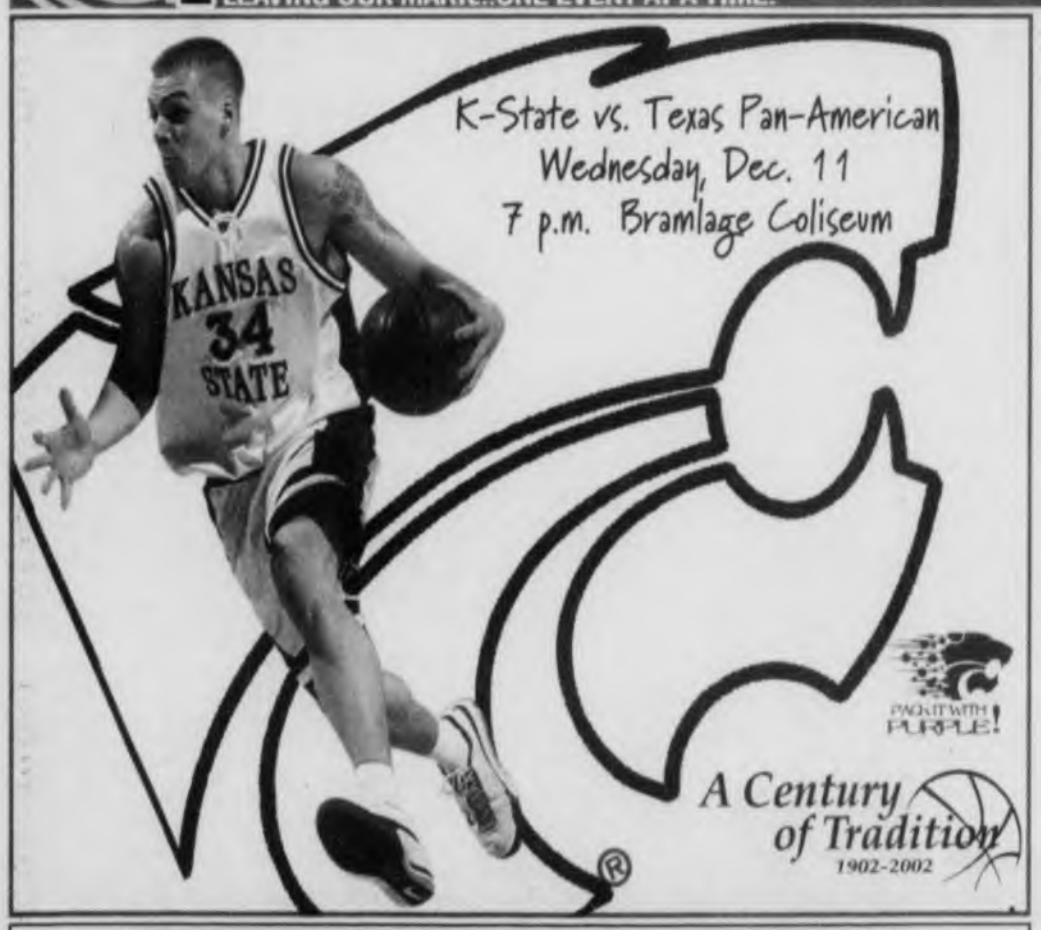
"We're going to have to find some way to be more effective in getting our message out," said J. Lester Hooper, chairman for the force. "It's not doing the job we would like for it to do."

Hooper blames the college environment and a change in the city's social makeup for the underage drinking problem.

"Aggieville is the collection point," he said. "It drags in the middle-school and high-school kids, and it's an influence and puts peer pressure on our kids that they wouldn't have in communities without the college setting."

To combat those factors, Hooper said the task force is encouraging parents to get involved with prevention.

"The parent is your No. 1 thing to work with their own kids and talk to them about what they think for their family," Hooper said. "There's been a differentiation along the way from no drinking at all to moderate drinking to heavy drinking. And with some of the parents both working, it takes a lot of time and energy. Not as much time is spent on checking what the kids are doing and keeping them informed.



"In Manhattan, we talk about these percentages on alcohol use being above the state average," he said. "Parents sweep it under the rug, and as long as their kid doesn't get involved or get hurt, they just let it go."

Watson warns that without parental intervention, the problem could get worse with time.

"The parents are of primary importance," Watson said. "They should know what their children are doing. They should talk to the young people. It's a difficult subject when it comes to drinking, but parents need to go through that uncomfortableness of sitting these young people down.

"It might not make a difference, but it shows them you do care, that you don't think they should be involved in that kind of behavior and that you certainly don't condone it."

SBC: A community partner, contributing to Kansas

"For over a century, SBC has served our state as a community partner, in challenging and prosperous times alike."

For more information about the benefits of full telecommunications competition, please visit www.connectkansas.org.

You've probably heard some of it — the latest criticism of SBC Southwestern Bell by our competitors, working hard and spending plenty to try to mislead customers and state leaders.

Well, I've worked for SBC here in Kansas for a long time, and I know what the real face of SBC looks like.

For over a century, SBC has served our state as a community partner, in challenging and prosperous times alike. Despite last year's weak economy, SBC invested over $790 million in Kansas.

SBC is interested in the people it serves and their success, which is why a large part of the company's investment is in people. In our state, SBC:

- employs over 3,000 Kansans;
- has an annual payroll of over $162 million;
- contributes over $130 million to vital state programs through annual taxes;
- buys about $300 million in goods and services every year from Kansas businesses; and
- gives about $2 million a year to charitable organizations and initiatives statewide.

Our employees and retirees invest in their communities, too, through the SBC Pioneers. Last year, they donated over 120,000 volunteer hours — about $2 million worth of "sweat equity" — across Kansas.

SBC's biggest investment has been in technology. Last year, we invested almost $200 million in infrastructure improvements, delivering high-speed Internet access to more Kansans — because extending broadband stimulates our state's economy and helps keep Kansas competitive.

At SBC, we understand that "service quality" is more than a catch phrase. When disaster strikes, we're there for our customers. For example, during last winter's record-breaking ice storm, repair requests were 600% above normal--67,000 requests for repairs in a 15 day period. Over 600 SBC technicians went to work to get every single telephone back in service.

SBC has provided high-quality service to Kansans for over 100 years, and we want to keep on investing in this state. We're your neighbors, your friends and your community partners — we're the real face of SBC.

City takes measures to ensure correct billing

By Dana Strongin
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

After two significant water underbilling incidents surfaced in September, Manhattan officials vowed to review the city's water billing system and alter or fix it accordingly.

The officials have met their promises and plan to do more to increase the accuracy of water bills.

The first incident was discovered around mid-September, when city officials realized they had been underbilling Colbert Hills Golf Course for about three years. Because of a misunderstanding, city meter readers were reading a meter on the course at amounts one-tenth less than what they should have been.

City employees also found the meter had been broken for about four or five months, City Manager Ron Fehr said.

Colbert officials said they would reimburse the city for the amount, which in September, city officials estimated to be more than $352,000.

David Gourlay, director of golf course operations at Colbert, said the city and the course are still exploring the number because of discrepancies.

The city based its price on estimated usage numbers, which Fehr said golf course officials said were too high. Course managers then collected climate and usage data and presented that to the city.

"On preliminary review, I think they're right," Fehr said. "We are researching to reach a proper estimated amount and reach the final number."

The city hopes to have the quantity resolved with Colbert officials by January, Fehr said. Then a payment process will be established.

A few days after city officials discovered the Colbert Hills underbilling, they found a problem with K-State's Van Zile Dining Hall.

The hall was underbilled for about two years for a final amount of $16,692.22, said Bernie Hayen, director of city finance. Hayen said in September that the billing problem was the result of a meter malfunction. City meter readers were reading an outside meter that didn't work, even though the meter fed into a functioning inside

Reference Web site helps students with research papers

By Pete Elsasser
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Writing a research paper just got easier.

Rebecca Gould, director of Information Technology Assistance Center, said K-State students and faculty can now use RefWorks, an online reference manager.

The program allows users to create their own databases of references for any type of research project or paper by importing information from a library database or typing in the information. They then import this information to any type of term paper or research project.

"Throughout their career here, they can import these references to whatever they need," Gould said. "They don't have to go back and search again for a reference they've already used. Once it is already in, they can go into the library's database and import it to RefWorks."

Gould said individuals can register at www.refworks.com. The system works, she said, by allowing students to write a term paper using 20 references, for example, and then the student can save and collect these references over the number of years they remain at K-State.

Students create their own database for term papers

According to the Kansas Department of Transportation, state law in Kansas says that driving with a blood alcohol concentration of .08 or more is a crime. For a first offense, penalties include 100 hours of community service, 48 hours of imprisonment, fines ranging from $500 to $1,000, plus court costs and evaluation fees, driving privileges suspended for 30 days and restricted driving privileges for another 330 days.

DYING TO DRINK

Officials call for education to reduce drunken driving fatality statistics

By Jamie Barrett
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Jan. 1, 2002, was supposed to be just another New Year's Day for 20-year-old Diego Velasquez.

Velasquez, a former K-State student, was returning from Phoenix, Ariz., with a friend early in the morning last New Year's Day.

Velasquez and Matthew Dunn had taken a trip to Arizona to see the Wildcats take on the Syracuse Orangemen in the Insight.com bowl game. The pair had partied over the New Year, celebrated and generally had a good time during their vacation.

They also had been drinking.

At 3:10 a.m., on their way back to Manhattan on Interstate 70, the 1998 Ford truck that Velasquez and Dunn were riding in went into the median and then proceeded to flip, end over end. Velasquez was thrown from the vehicle.

Velasquez lost his life in a one-vehicle crash that New Year's Day because of the accident, which allegedly involved alcohol or drugs.

Driving under the influence

In 2001, more than 17,000 people were killed in auto accidents involving alcohol in the United States.

Drunken driving, or driving while under the influence of drugs or alcohol, has become the most frequently committed violent crime in America today, according to a report from the Mothers Against Drunk Driving.

Driving under the influence also has become a crime that most Americans rank as their No. 1 highway safety concern, according to a MADD survey.

Riley County Police Department Lieutenant Michael Quintanar said it is not difficult to identify, and pull over, those drivers who are under the influence.

"It's not hard to find a drunk," he said.

But drunken drivers are not always found in time.

Even though the 17,448 people killed on U.S. roadways in 2001 only accounted for 41 percent of the total traffic fatalities and was about the same as in 2000 and 1999, the plateaued numbers are not acceptable for many people – especially those who have lost loved ones to the effects of drunk driving.

Losing a son

Fernando Ugarte has had strong feelings about drunk driving for a long time.

After his son, Velasquez, was killed in a drunken driving accident, Ugarte said his feelings about alcohol and drunk driving didn't really change – they just intensified.

"I am totally opposed to drinking and driving," Ugarte said. "Drunk driving is a horrible and hideous thing."

Ugarte, who is a general surgeon in Marysville, Kan., said drinking and driving is a problem in American culture because so many people are taught that drinking is the only way to celebrate and have fun.

He said one way to combat the problem of drunken driving is for people to change their attitudes toward drinking in general.

Driving legal in Kansas

In Kansas, it is illegal to operate a motor vehicle with a blood or breath alcohol concentration of .08 or above. That is equivalent to about 4 drinks in one hour for an average size man, on an empty stomach and 3 drinks in one hour for an average size woman, on an empty stomach.

For people under the age of 21, Kansas has a zero tolerance law. It is illegal to operate a motor vehicle with a blood or breath alcohol concentration of .02 or above. The smallest amount of blood or breath alcohol concentration measurable is .02.

Source: Kansas Department of Transportation Web site and Mothers Against Drunk Driving Web site.

"People have to handle pressure different," he said. "They don't have to celebrate with liquor. A lot of people are very happy without drinking."

For Ugarte, it is hard to understand why there are not stricter laws regarding drunk driving in Kansas. He said he doesn't understand why when someone kills another person with a gun he or she might go to jail for life, but if someone kills another person with a car, he or she might only go to jail for six months to two years.

Students adapt to lack of hearing

Hearing-impaired students use other forms of communication

Photos by Emily Happer | COLLEGIAN

Tracey Pfannenstiel, senior in public relations, and Sarah Eaverson, junior in music education, sign the words, "We are deaf." Both women have hearing loss but can communicate without using sign language.

Pfannenstiel uses two hearing aids and reads lips to help her communicate. Eaverson can hear high and low pitches and does not use a hearing aid.

By Patrice Holderbach
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Even with seven alarm clocks buzzing in the background, Tracey Pfannenstiel can sleep peacefully at Sigma Kappa.

Without her two hearing aids, Pfannenstiel, senior in public relations, suffers from 80-decibel hearing loss.

The threshold for normal hearing is less than or equal to 25-decibel hearing loss, according to an audiodiagram interpretation.

Pfannenstiel uses the hearing aids, and an ability to read lips, to aid in communication.

"A lot of people in society haven't really been around a deaf person, so it is hard for them to understand what a deaf person goes through," she said. "They don't understand what it's like."

Pfannenstiel, who ran cross country and track for Colby Community College, also enjoys dance, art and visiting her boyfriend, Marc Walsh, at K-State-Salina.

She said she has developed patience and a stronger personality because of her hearing loss.

"I have to be able to explain to people, 'I need this, I need that.' I have to be very insistent with people," Pfannenstiel said.

Interpreter Natalie Smith, who teaches manual communications, said the 15 hearing-impaired students adapt to challenges at K-State with assistance from Disability Support Services.

Disability Support Services provides note-takers and sign-language interpreters, as well as assisted-listening devices and special phones for hearing-impaired students, Smith said.

Not all hearing-impaired individuals consider themselves deaf, she said.

"Some hearing-impaired do not identify themselves with the deaf, and some do," Smith said. "There are those that are hard of hearing, or deaf, and do identify themselves with the deaf community."

Though she can become frustrated, Pfannenstiel turns challenges into opportunities, especially with teachers.

"I've had to overcome a lot of obstacles that people who have hearing wouldn't have to overcome," she said. "Like in a classroom setting, I miss out on a lot of instructions that teachers give. I have to go up to a teacher and ask them, and this is a great way to get to know them. As a result, all the teachers know me."

Sarah Eaverson, junior in music education, has a hearing loss that occurs in the middle range, meaning she can hear high and low pitches, but not dialogue.

She said some people question her major.

"I'm a music education major, so naturally people look at me skeptically," she said. "They figure I won't be able to hear my students, so why am I wasting a perfectly good education.

"I tell them it's something I love to do and I'm going to do it as long as I can. Although it's hurtful to hear those kinds of things, I know that I will be able to do my job well in the future."

Eaverson said her hearing has sharpened since the second grade, when she first began losing her hearing. Using perfect pitch, Eaverson can sing an A 440 note without a piano or pitch pipe. A 440 is the pitch where a perfect "A" is sounded.

"This amazes my musiced friends," she said. "I can tell whether a choir or band is flat or sharp in a second. You need good ears to have perfect pitch. They think it's cool that I have perfect pitch even though I have a hearing loss."

Pfannenstiel said the point at which she lost her hearing could not be determined, because as a toddler, she was capable of what her parents called "Flintstone" talking, which sounded like babbling.

"Either I was born deaf, or I was born kind of deaf, and my hearing just degenerated – or there was a series of ear infections. What threw us off was I was able to talk," Pfannenstiel said.

Until sixth grade, she had the help of a paraprofessional, but never used a sign interpreter. She would spend two hours a night working with her parents on different drills to help her communicate.

"In the community, parents who have deaf children so often think the deaf child can't do anything," she said. "They don't think the child will have a real bright future.

"I think parents should think that their children can do anything that they want to, no matter what disability that they have. My parents have told me so much with helping me know I can do anything, and I can accomplish anything I want to."

Risks worth taking for Parachute Club

Club participating in national competition

By Rogie Dorpinghaus
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

For Chris Armstrong's 19th birthday, he wanted to do something "wild and crazy."

He decided to try skydiving.

"There's just something about it that you can't explain," said Armstrong, senior in economics and vice president of the K-State Parachute Club. "I think it's almost the fear of the unknown that got me started into it, and once I did it, I fell in love with it – with flying."

Armstrong, with 250 jumps under his belt, has the highest skydiving license, called D. This license allows him to teach others or land his parachute in parks.

The parachute club, which is the oldest collegiate club in the United States, has been competing nationally for almost 20 years, said David Hicks, president of the club and senior in mechanical engineering.

After talking about it and driving by the drop zone on numerous occasions, Hicks got involved with the club in October 1999, when he signed up at a table in the K-State Student Union.

Neither Armstrong nor Hicks said being in the club was financially burdensome.

The club doesn't charge a gear rental fee for every jump, unlike other jump zones, which helps college students remain members, Armstrong said.

"It costs money to do it," Hicks said. "But if you're not skydiving, you'll be doing something else that costs money."

Matt Beavers, fifth year senior in mechanical engineering and treasurer of the club, joined two years ago. His first jump, which initiated him into the club, was a present from a girlfriend for Christmas.

He said his favorite part about the club is the friendship.

"We're like a big family," Beavers said. "It's fun, and we have good times."

Beavers and Armstrong said they also will be in the national competition.

Both will compete in the sport accuracy, and free-fly divisions.

Sport accuracy is a competition that includes a 45-meter circle target.

The jumper must enter the circle, touch dead center of it and stop within the circle. The object is to complete the previous tasks in the shortest distance.

The free-fly division is when formations randomly are pulled out of a hat, and the jumper must complete as many of the formations in sequence within 30 seconds, Armstrong said.

Beavers has never competed before but isn't worried about the outcome.

"Regardless of what happens, it's going to be fun," he said. "However we do, we do."

He said one of the things that made him more comfortable before his first dive was knowing that skydiving was safer than driving to school every day.

"There's a risk in everything you do – I don't feel nervous about it, probably because I've done it 200 times," Hicks said. "It's kind of like driving – you always respect it and try to make it as safe as you can."

A leap of good faith

Facts about the Parachute Club

- The K-State Parachute Club is the oldest collegiate club in the United States. It formed in the early 1960s.
- This club is the only one to own and operate its own aircraft and drop zone. Membership fees pay for these two commodities.
- The club is going to the 2002 Collegiate National Skydiving Championship from Dec. 27 to Jan. 1, in Eloy, Ariz.
- The club is open to anyone 18 years or older and less than 220 pounds.

U.S. allows missiles into Yemen after assurances International law violation dismissed

By Barry Schweid
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON – Skirting a face-off with Yemen, the United States on Wednesday let an intercepted shipment of North Korean missiles proceed to the Persian Gulf country after receiving assurances the Scuds would not be transferred elsewhere in the tense region.

The agreement was reached through unusual high-level diplomacy involving Vice President Dick Cheney and Secretary of State Colin Powell, on the one hand, and President Ali Abdallah Salih of Yemen on the other.

Spanish authorities, whose naval forces intercepted the ship in the Arabian Sea, also were deeply involved in the awkward negotiations, as was Cambodia, in southeast Asia.

Bush administration officials acknowledged that boarding the ship and taking charge of its cargo probably violated international law. But administration decision-makers were guided by concern about an influx of weapons into the Persian Gulf region just as the United States is considering force to disarm Iraq.

"We were very suspicious about the ship," said State Department spokesman Richard Boucher. "At first one couldn't verify the nationality of the ship because the ship's name and the indications of nationality on the hull and the funnel were obscured. It was flying no flag."

Once Spanish and U.S. inspectors climbed aboard, they found "irregularities in the cargo and the documentation and the Scuds were found on board the ship," he said.

"So a ship like this acting suspiciously in a sensitive part of the world carrying what might be missiles from North Korea is obviously going to get a lot of attention," the spokesman said.

Behind the scenes, there was disagreement within the administration. Powell concluded Yemen was entitled to the missiles because they had been purchased prior to a pledge Yemen made in July 2001 not to obtain any more weapons technology from North Korea.

But some Pentagon officials took the position the pledge applied to prior contracts as well, and that Yemen was obliged not to take delivery of the weapons.

Powell, at a State Department luncheon at which he received an award from the American Academy of Diplomacy, said Salih offered assurance the shipment of Scuds would be the last weapons delivery from North Korea.

The secretary denounced North Korea as "one of the great proliferators on the face of the earth." He said the United States has been trying to make the case worldwide that the Communist regime posed dangers.

Ironically, the Bush administration has not tried to negotiate curbs on missile exports with North Korea since it broke other accords by proceeding with a nuclear weapons program, thereby convincing U.S. officials it could not be trusted to keep its word.

Powell said the good relationship between the United States and Yemen was one reason for permitting delivery of the Scuds. Bush administration officials have credited Yemen for about a year for cooperating in the U.S. campaign to counter terror.

After a "flurry of phone calls" and assurances from Salih to Cheney and Powell that "this would be the end of it," Powell said, the shipment was allowed to proceed.

Salih that the missiles were intended for Yemen's self-defense and would not be turned over to any other country, Powell said.

Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, speaking to reporters in Qatar, said the ship was intercepted because "there were questions about its flag, questions about its cargo and questions about its destination." The ship's contents were not on its manifest, he said.

Forces from the amphibious assault ship USS Nassau had been aboard the detained vessel since Tuesday awaiting orders on what to do with it and the weapons, Pentagon officials said.

The master of the ship said it was from Cambodia, but officials of the Southeast Asian country informed the United States they were not sure but approved boarding the ship, a U.S. official said.

The crew, meanwhile, claimed to be Cambodians but may have been North Koreans, said the official, speaking on condition of anonymity.

Yemeni Foreign Minister Abu Bakr al-Kerbi summoned U.S. Ambassador Edmund Hull to protest the seizure and ask for the return of the equipment, which was for "defensive purposes," a Yemeni official told The Associated Press in San'a.

TO THE POINT

Focus needed elsewhere, not just on Saddam

U.S. government officials found out Tuesday that North Korea shipped scud-type missiles to Yemen.

The ship carrying the missiles was intercepted, but this reveals a problem.

Is there a war plan against terrorism from either of these countries? It seems that the United States has been concentrating so much on Iraq that it has neglected other countries that may pose a threat.

Today's news shows that the United States needs to be abreast of what is happening in other countries – not just Iraq.

Military action needs to be planned for any country that could threaten the United States. It is naive to think there is only one country that could do so.

Although we are sure that the government is now aware that North Korea and Yemen pose a threat to the United States, the government needs to develop a plan and monitor these countries with precaution.

Government officials need to make sure they follow through with their promise of ending terrorism. In order to follow through with their promises, officials should know that terrorism is not just concentrated in one area, and they must focus effort on all countries that could threaten U.S. safety.

DROWZY DRIVING

Students should be aware of signs of fatigue

SUSAN POWELL

With winter break approaching and bank accounts wincing, many students opt to drive home for the holidays. Though there are obvious advantages to driving, such as setting your own schedule and avoiding airport security pat-downs, there is a greater stress on the individual to be responsible.

You might consider yourself capable of driving long distances, but those endless stretches of pavement can put more than your bum to sleep.

In fact, more than 100,000 annual police-reported crashes involve drowsiness as a principal factor in the accident, according to the National Sleep Foundation's Web site, www.sleepfoundation.org.

The National Sleep Foundation also estimates 71,000 people are injured and 1,500 are killed due to drowsy drivers each year.

However, these statistics are conservative, as it is difficult to determine sleepiness as the cause of many accidents. There is no standardized criteria concerning drowsy drivers, and many states do not have a code for sleepiness on their crash-report forms.

When considering who is susceptible to drowsy driving look around campus. Those most at risk for causing accidents from fatigue are young, sleep-deprived, frequent travelers and those who drive long distances alone.

Sounds like many of us are candidates as we shrug off sleepless nights of finals week, hurriedly pack our things and plan that eight-hour journey home.

Prevention is the most effective measure of combating fatigue while driving. Obviously, a full night's sleep before the trip is crucial in keeping you alert.

If you can, plan to travel with a friend. The conversations will keep you attentive and give you the option to switch drivers when feeling tired.

Avoiding alcohol and some forms of medication that impair motor skills will help the driver stay focused as well.

If you are unable to drive with a companion, you should be careful to note certain signs of sleepiness:

- Drowsy drivers often can't recollect the last few miles they've driven. They tend to wander from their lane or hit a rumble strip, which alerts drivers of their meandering.
- Thoughts often become disconnected, and drivers are unable to focus and keep their eyes open.
- Drowsy drivers tend to tailgate or miss traffic signs and jerk their cars in to stay in the designated lane.

One problem with drowsy drivers is the mentality that their fatigue is fleeting, and no real harm can be done by their drooping lids.

This mentality is supported by our laws, as Kansas has no real legal repercussions for drowsy drivers. There are pages of fines for DUIs but none discussing fatigue on the Kansas Department of Transportation's Web page, kdot1.ksdot.org.

Although there are no scientific measures of fatigue like there are for drinking, we should be able to measure our own limits concerning weariness.

We've known our personal sleep patterns for decades, as well as what tends to induce sleep. Be aware of biological warning signs, since those helpful rumble strips won't always be there to refresh you.

Are you super hero or super boring?

LAYTON EHMKE

Imagine yourself between the ages of 5 and 9, setting up your collection of Star Wars, G.I. Joe, He Man or A-Team action figures.

Or, in the case of the ladies who read my column, you can have your choice of Barbie, or whatever you chicks played with back in the day (It's been at least 10 solid years since I hung out with my Star Wars figures and G.I. Joes, and I assume the same is true for most of you – but bear with me, this should be fun).

Now imagine there is an action figure made to resemble your adult self.

Your 3 1/2 inch-high replicated self is wearing what you typically wear today, plus some sort of gadget, gun or special powers. In my case, it would be wearing green cargo pants, a black shirt and a backpack. It would have long, curly hippie hair and come with five stocking caps and a black book. My special powers would be thought control, or as some of you might recall, the Force.

My Star Wars self would not carry a blaster, but would be equipped with a light saber and a fountain pen.

You have to think about what kinds of attributes your toy would have to offer the rest of the figures on your team. Would your figure be a dependable member of the group, or would it be the wacky mamma-jamma that was made for kicks?

The question is: Would your 7-year-old self want the action figure of your adult self to add to the collection?

My 7-year-old self would most definitely choose me first. Then again, the me of today would probably freak out if I bought an action figure of the me 15 years from now. I don't even want to think about it. Bald, fat, poor, single. What a bummer.

But what I want to know is this: Do people see what they are going to be before they become it?

I don't think so. People change. For instance, if the dorky, junior-high me saw the insane, hippie-lookin' cat I am today, I'd honestly freak out.

But here's a quick test I came up with just to be sure:

1. Does the action figure of yourself come with a
   a. cape?
   b. map?
   c. magnifying glass?
2. Is the figure's weapon a
   a. light saber/sword?
   b. machine gun/heavy blaster?
   c. stick?
3. Does the figure appear
   a. dark/mysterious?
   b. practical/confident?
   c. colorful/smiling?
4. Does it come with a side-kick who is a
   a. droid?
   b. Wookie?
   c. turtle?

Note: Question 5 is only for the fellas.

5. If your action figure was locked in a doll house with other toys would he
   a. get to know Barbie a little better?
   b. make moves on Wonder-Woman?
   c. go all the way with a few of the My Little Ponies?

If you answered "a" to most questions, your action figure is a true leader, and you obviously dig yourself. However, you have a great capacity for evil. You might also not know the identity of your father, but you've got this feeling ...

For those who answered "b" to most questions, you'll be alright in life. Just be careful about stroking your Wookie. He might bite.

If you answered "c" to most questions, your action figure is a wimp. It will be in thrift stores all across the country the day after Christmas. Good luck in life.

This is merely a test of self-worth and acceptance, and the important thing is that you recognize the fact that people change, oftentimes for the better. But there are two sides to every tale. Just hope for the best.

Editor,

I am writing to ask all students to call or e-mail their student senators and ask for their support in the resolution to add the K-State Graduate School to our Honor System.

As a second-semester member of the Undergraduate Honor Council, I have seen the effectiveness of having a student-led honor program. By incorporating the graduate school into the Honor System, we will continue the integrity and equality in education that K-State so proudly displays.

K-State prides itself on the academic achievement, quality of educators and equality among students. The Honor System, however, is not equal.

When an undergraduate has been accused of an Honor Code violation, he is assigned an undergraduate to investigate his case.

If the accusation qualifies for a hearing, the accused sits before a panel that is a majority of his peers. The alleged violator is given a peer adviser experienced with the Honor Program.

If a graduate student is accused of an Honor Code violation (which he is not even bound to in the first place), he is assigned a faculty adviser, must follow the chain of command through faculty and administrators, then sit before a panel made up of the same people.

For a university that prides itself on equality among students, this does not seem very fair to me.

In the case of classes that have both undergraduates and graduates, I do not believe it is fair that two students taking the same class are not held to the same standards of honor and integrity. We need to have consistency among all of our students to create equality.

By incorporating the graduate school into the Honor System, the university will save time, energy and money. The Honor System would only have to recruit two or three new graduate members, and one or two new graduate faculty members.

Since the council members are volunteers, and all cases are conducted "in-house," there would be no additional cost to the university. In addition, the Honor System keeps a record of all violators of the Honor Pledge, and acts as a "clearing house" for the colleges on campus.

Finally, the undergraduate school has a system that has proven to deter violations and help students understand the Honor Pledge.

Please take what I have written into consideration, and go to the Office of Student Activities and Services, find the name of your student senator and let him or her know you want his or her vote for the incorporation of the graduate school into the K-State Honor System.

It is time for a change, and time for the university to become consistent with its Honor policies.

The veterinary school has an Honor Council and the undergraduate school has an Honor Council.

Isn't it time the graduate school follows suit?

WATER | City officials respond to errors; restructuring part of review

meter.

The meter has been replaced, and Dale Boggs, K-State's associate director of facilities maintenance and utilities, said he has authorized the payment of the bill.

Manhattan officials then reviewed K-State's larger meters and found about six more underbilling problems. Boggs said most of those meters have been fixed, and he has authorized the university to pay the city back. Both Hayen and Boggs said the total amount of these errors was not high enough to be considered significant.

The problems with university underbilling led city officials to create a new billing category just for K-State. Now, the three main categories of customers are commercial, residential and university, Hayen said.

Hayen said the university designation was long overdue.

"Some of the groundwork laid in the late '70s and '80s was ill-defined," he said. "Some of the arrangements didn't make any sense.

"We want to develop a system that both City Hall and the university will be comfortable with five years down the road, so new people in City Hall or the university can look back and know the process and begin carrying it forward," he said.

University meters are split into three sub-categories: facilities, housing and foundation. Facilities and housing together have 49 meters, and the foundation has six, Hayen said.

Hayen said the university is working to reduce the amount of meters the city reads to decrease the chance for error. At the same time, K-State is adding to the amount of meters it monitors and reads on its own.

This cooperation between K-State and Manhattan has created a comfortable partnership, Hayen said.

"We both give and take to share the cost," he said. "Everyone seems satisfied."

Fehr agreed, saying a city/university task force for the issue raised awareness and understanding.

"There was a question in the past about who's responsible for certain pieces of equipment," Fehr said. "There has been excellent cooperation in the delineation of who would be responsible for meters and water lines."

Boggs said the new measures help the university track its own use. What has also helped K-State, he said, are the new specialized reports the city is sending to the university.

"We get a monthly report on the activity of meters. It helps us determine if there is a problem with a meter or not," Boggs said.

In addition to the university reports, the city has established specialized reports for other large users, new users and any user that registers a zero, Hayen said. He said zero-use bills are more common in the winter when residents leave town for an extended period of time and shut off their water.

New users are monitored for six months, Hayen said. City officials will continually roll over which accounts to study each month.

Manhattan officials are hoping to start additional accountability reports to prevent mistakes, Hayen said. The reports should start at the beginning of the year.

Officials restructured city departments in response to the underbillings. Both billing and meter reading are now functions of the finance department. For nearly two months, they have had weekly meetings to bring employees together, Hayen said.

City employees also conducted an audit of Manhattan's about 12,400 commercial and residential water customers. They compared bills against three previous years.

According to the city's audit summary, 12,397 accounts were reviewed. Of those, 1,105 were isolated for further review. Only 22 accounts needed action beyond review, such as meter repairs.

Hayen said city officials also followed through with other measures proposed in September. The city has altered its billing system, which used to generate reports only if a user's monthly water usage was above a ceiling amount. Now, a reverse override system also provides reports when usage drops below a floor amount. They also checked billing software for quality control, Hayen said.

"The utility billing system is solid," he said. "I am confident that the problems with getting inaccurate bills out has been put to rest."

Fehr said city officials are focusing on updating meter equipment to minimize the potential for human error. Hayen said the city will try and purchase more equipment after the beginning of the year.

"Even though there is a crunch of money, we will try to improve the number and quality of meters next year," Hayen said.

Fehr said the completed steps have already benefited the city.

"We've done a lot of good productivity work to minimize the opportunity of this happening again," Fehr said.

PAPERS | RefWorks online research system arrives to campus

using whatever citation style they need, and it allows them to manage their reference database.

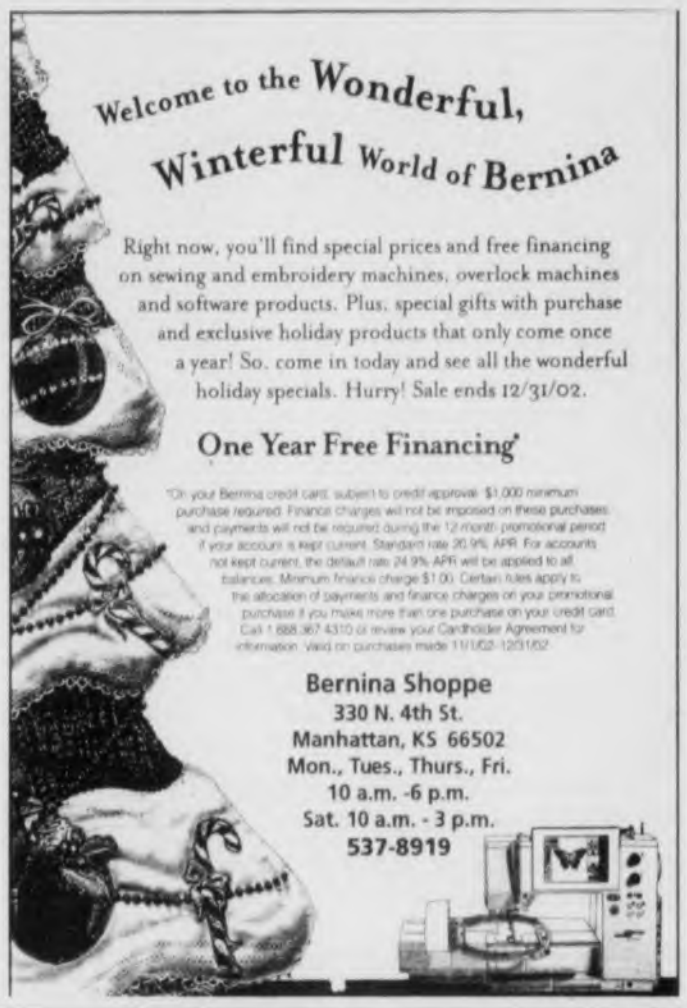
Purchasing RefWorks for use costs $8,000, Gould said. Currently, 127 people have input 8,370 references since K-State students and faculty began using it Oct. 21. Gould said ITAC and Hale Library are providing training in the use of RefWorks, and all students, faculty and groups can take advantage of it.

"We want undergrads to use this system, and you can imagine how a graduate student would use it," Gould said. "Once students see how valuable this is, they'll be really excited."

Abbey Nutsch, research assistant professor, said she has been using RefWorks for about three weeks. She said she's involved with the Food Science Institute, and she's working on a cooperative agreement with the USDA with Texas A&M and Purdue.

"RefWorks helps us because of the multiple locations of using it to input references where numerous people across different campuses can access the same database," Nutsch said.

Nutsch said the system will be helpful at the end of the project to assist with amassing bibliographies.



Sara Kearns, business economics librarian, said right now her department is still learning how to utilize the new system and figuring out its potential.

"There's a lot of good work that can be done with it," Kearns said. "Everyone is still learning it since we haven't had it for very long, and we're trying to get the word out."

Wildcat women to meet hot Wisconsin-Green Bay squad

Phoenix put 6-game winning streak to test tonight; K-State prepared to handle UWGB 3-point weapons

By Tom Fontana
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Against the Stanford Cardinals on Nov. 30, the K-State women's basketball team struggled offensively and defensively in a 63-57 loss, its first loss of the season.

Tonight, the Cats will face another hot team away from the confines of Bramlage Coliseum when they play the Wisconsin-Green Bay Phoenix.

The Phoenix have won six straight games and enter the contest with a 13-game unbeaten streak at home. Sophomore guard Laurie Koehn said the Stanford game taught a valuable lesson about playing on the road – that things don't easily go in a hostile environment.

"It's really important," she said. "I think we learned a lot from the Stanford experience. So now we just need to come out and build.

"Wisconsin-Green Bay is a great team, and we just know that we have to go in there focused and ready to play our game and do the things that we've been taught to do."

A six-game winning streak is tough to stop, but sophomore forward Kendra Wecker said with the game on the road, it makes the task that much tougher.

"Going on the road is totally different than being at home in front of 8,000 people," she said. "We just have to learn from what happened at Stanford and just to go and play with composure, no matter what happens.

"If we're down 10 (points) in the first couple minutes of the game, we just have to kind of keep our heads up and keep executing our offense," Wecker said. "We can't get rattled by what's going on."

UW-Green Bay is coming off a 60-58 win over No. 25 Texas Christian on Dec. 3. The Associated Press acknowledged this, as the Phoenix received 35 votes in this weeks AP top 25 poll.

"They're very tough," junior center Nicole Ohlde said. "They've beat some really high competition in the past couple weeks.

"It's going to be really hard," she said. "They're a real scrappy team – blue collar and hard workers – so, this is going to be tough. We're going to have to go out there and play K-State basketball."

Defensively, the Cats must focus on stopping the three-point shot of the Phoenix, Wecker said.

UW-Green Bay is shooting 47.2 percent from behind the arc so far this season.

"They're going to be a lot like Stanford – just going to be shooting up a lot of three's," Wecker said. "We've been working on some things defensively to correct the problems we had out there, and we just have to be ready to guard them out on the perimeter.

"That's the way Big 12 teams are. They're going to light it up from outside if you're right in their face or five feet off the three-point line. We've got to be ready."

K-State beat UW-Green Bay last season, 85-66, at Bramlage Coliseum.

Ohlde said performing well in this game could help the Cats as a conference season looms closer.

"I think we're doing a lot of really good things right now," she said. "We've had a lot of really good competition. I think we are a little bit ahead of where we were last year with the harder competition.

"I think things are going good right now, and I'm just looking forward to the rest of December before we start Big 12 play."

BCS bashing continues: Changes necessary for system to work right

Bashing the Bowl Championship Series has evolved into a tradition for sports journalists across America.

But there is no simple solution to the BCS. It is a program born to fail, and it has done so marvelously.

JOEL REICHENBERGER

The only chance to remedy the BCS will require a complete overhaul and an expansion to encompass all of the post-season bowls.

The BCS arose out of a strange time in college football. The sport was becoming more and more competitive and every year there seemed to be more pressure to find a way to crown an actual champion. Each season seemed to produce only more disappointing results.

The pre-BCS system, the Bowl Alliance, was structured entirely on conference matchups. The Rose Bowl would always feature the Big Ten champion versus the Pac-10 champion, no matter its rank. The Orange Bowl had ties to the Big 8, and the Cotton Bowl was in bed with the now defunct Southwestern conference.

Pre-established ties amounted to unbreakable bonds that kept the best teams from facing each other in bowl games.

College football struggled to find an answer. The BCS was born.

The BCS was supposed to be a step in a better direction. At last the No. 1 team in the nation would meet the No. 2 team no matter what conference it was in or what bowl it would have gone to.

While not thrown out, old-school conference tie-ins became less important than finding a champion.

The matchups of the last two seasons clearly illustrate this trend. For two consecutive seasons now, the Rose Bowl won't feature a Big Ten versus Pac-10 matchup. Rather, last season it hosted the National Championship and this season it got trumped out of the best Big Ten teams by the other BCS bowls.

Further, one of the teams that wound up playing in 2002 Championship game – Nebraska – didn't even win its own conference.

The BCS – the poster child of breaking conference tie-ins – has not relinquished its own tie-ins, which is the problem.

The champions from the Big 12, the Big Ten, the Pac-10, the ACC, the Big East and the SEC all still receive automatic bids. Such a system sent an undeserving Texas A&M to the Sugar Bowl after the 1998 season and will send even more unworthy Florida State to the Sugar Bowl this season.

There is not nearly as much stock put into winning a conference in 2002 as there was in 1950. Then, the conference was everything. Now, it is just a stepping stone. For the good teams, it's little more than a warm-up for the big BCS game.

Focus has shifted away from winning a conference title and toward winning a National Championship.

By retaining conference tie-ins of its own, the BCS is impeding the one problem it was supposed to solve. It was designed to bring the best teams together to play, but the tie-ins restrict it from doing so.

For the BCS to be effective, it must be expanded. The dream that created it must be realized. Bowls must ditch their conference tie-ins so that premier teams can be matched up without crossing over any sacred boundaries or conference lines.

A new bowl entity needs to be created. But rather than just rectify the top four bowls, this system needs to extend from all of the post-season games.

This time, it should receive all of the power when it comes to delegating bowl invitations. Under such a system, Florida State would not be in the top tier of bowls, and K-State would not be in the middle tier.

Teams that earned their rankings throughout the season would be rewarded in bowls that they deserved. The fans who diligently followed them would be rewarded by being able to see high-caliber matchups rather than the murder of unranked teams or the highlighting of middle-of-the-road teams in the spotlight bowls.

Since the inception of the BCS, conferences have tried to bend its rules. They have attempted to leverage its decisions in order to make more money and land their teams in the better games. But college football should not come down to petty games of one-upsmanship. Just as many people say, ranking shouldn't be decided on a computer and bowl games shouldn't be decided in a conference room – or under the conference table.

A new system, one born free of any conference strings could provide the matchups that America so desires. No. 8 K-State would face off against another top 10 team, likely in one of the top four or five bowl games. The day of the conference-on-conference matchups has passed.

Players, teams and fans want to see better games, and unless the BCS is surgically altered, that will never happen.

Wooldridge's scoring concerns eased after reaching century mark in win

By Joel Reichenberger
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State coach Jim Wooldridge said he was worried about his team's ability to score points coming into Wednesday night's game.

But after the Wildcats defeated Texas-Pan American 102-68, he said some of his concerns may have been addressed.

K-State (3-4) took advantage of hot shooting and a 19-0 first-half run to put away the Broncs for the third win of the season. The Cats hadn't broken the century mark in nearly five years – since a 111-56 win against Missouri on Jan. 3, 1998 –

Jarrett Hart was expected to be an immediate contributor this season for the Cats.

But Hart, a third team NJCAA All-American while averaging 19.4 points his sophomore season at Arkansas-Fort Smith Junior College, came into Wednesday night's game against Texas-Pan American with a sore thumb, averaging just 5.8 points per contest, and shooting only 31 percent from the floor.

His thumb didn't seem to bother him against the Broncs, though, as Hart found his stroke, hitting seven of eight shots from the floor, finishing

Volleyball | Downey-Wallace, Goehring named to all-region team Wednesday

Junior libero Laura Downey-Wallace and junior outside hitter Lauren Goehring picked up two more honors for their play this season, as the duo were selected to the honorable mention All-Central Region team on Wednesday afternoon in an announcement by the American Volleyball Coaches Association.

The two were joined on the honorable mention team by Missouri's Lindsey Hunter, Nebraska's Jennifer Saleaumua and Southwest Missouri State's Linette White. Those making the All-Central Region first team included the Nebraska trio of Greichaly Cepero, Amber Holmquist and Laura Pilakowski, the Northern Iowa threesome of Jill Arganbright, Kim Kester and Molly O'Brien, the Texas duo of Kathy Hahn and Mira Topic and Monique Gerlach of Colorado, Kelly Johnson of Texas Tech and Laura Jones of Texas A&M. Jones was named the Region's Freshman of the Year.

NFL | UCLA looking at Chiefs' Robinson

Kansas City defensive coordinator Greg Robinson is a candidate to become head coach at UCLA, Chiefs coach Dick Vermeil said Wednesday.

Robinson, the Chiefs' defensive coordinator for the past two years, was not available to comment.

Vermeil, almost as an aside at the end of his post-practice meeting with reporters, said he had spoken earlier in the day with UCLA Athletic Director Dan Guerrero about Robinson.

A Los Angeles native, the 51-year-old Robinson was an assistant coach at UCLA from 1982-89 and then moved into the NFL as a coach with the New York Jets.

NCAA | Heisman finalists announced

Top-ranked Miami's Ken Dorsey and Willis McGahee are Heisman Trophy finalists, the first time since 1994 that teammates were among the top five in the voting.

Iowa quarterback Brad Banks, Penn State running back Larry Johnson and Southern California quarterback Carson Palmer also were invited Wednesday for the award's presentation.

The winner of one of the most wide-open Heisman races will be announced Saturday night at the Yale Club in New York.

The last time two players from the same school finished in the top five was eight years ago, when Penn State's Ki-Jana Carter was second and Kerry Collins fourth.

NFL | Martz admits to QB controversy

Coach Mike Martz suggested for the first time Wednesday that if Marc Bulger continues to play as well as he has, he could compete with Kurt Warner next season for St. Louis Rams' quarterback job.

Bulger has a 106.0 passer rating, which would lead the NFL if he had enough attempts, and is 5-0 as a starter this year — the Rams' only victories. The third-stringer when the season began, he returns to the lineup on Sunday night against Arizona after recovering from a sprained right index finger.

Bulger has 12 touchdown passes and four interceptions. Martz said if he picks up where he left off, it will affect the team's quarterback situation next year.

Massage therapists to provide free service tonight in Union

By J. Scott Bowman
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It's time to relieve that end-of-semester tension with a hands-on method – massage.

On Thursday night, students will get an opportunity for that relief when the Union Program Council sponsors the "De-stress Before Finals" event. Ashley Friesen, special events committee chair, said that students need to have a chance to relax.

"Students have finals and it's hard to focus on studying with the stress," Friesen said. "So, we figured what better way is there to get rid of stress? We decided that we'd offer an opportunity for students to relax and get massages."

Massage therapy
When: 7-9 p.m., Thursday
Where: K-State Student Union Courtyard
Cost: Free

Besides massage, the Union Courtyard will be bustling with action. Several other activities will be provided, and all students have to do is show up, Friesen said.

"We will have crafts that people can make," she said. "We'll also have cookies for people to decorate. But,the most important thing is that everything is free."

Body First will provide the massage therapists. The opportunity to help students out during a stressful time is nice, Doug Sellers, owner of Body First, said.

This will be the fourth year that Sellers has provided the service, the other three years the event was held in Kramer Dining Hall. Sellers said that everyone can benefit from a massage.

"Unless you're stranded on an island without stress, everyone could probably use one because of stress," Sellers said.

"On Thursday, we will be providing chair massages, where we will focus on the head, back, neck and shoulder area.

"We will try to give everyone a 10 to 15 minute massage, but it all depends on the turnout."

Body First is a locally owned business that provides massage therapy. They give massages that are both therapeutic and relaxing using a variety of techniques, David Riggs, massage therapist, said.

"We have a lot of clients that come in and get therapeutic massages," Riggs said. "Some people have chronic pains, and some just like to come in and relax. I like it because it feels good to make people relax and feel better."

Some people have illnesses that require them to come in on a regular basis for pain relief, Riggs said. But, that's not the only reason why people should get a massage.

He said people get tense because stress will make the body release toxins into the muscles, and a massage will help to flush those toxins from the muscle area. Though, occasionally a few problems can take place on the massage table.

"I normally give anywhere between 15 and 30 massages a week, Riggs said.

"There are only a couple of conditions we don't massage for, and that normally includes a broken bone, certain kinds of cancer and skin infections. Other than cases like that, people won't get hurt by a school-trained massage therapist."

Sellers said that a good Web site to visit if someone wants more information on massage is the American Massage Therapy Association Web site. Body First also has a Web site at www.bodyfirst.com that offers information on massage, their prices and specials.

"We're going to come out with four therapists," Sellers said. "

We're going to be ready to help some students relax before their big week."

Top: David Riggs, massage therapist, demonstrates a seated chair massage on Doug Sellers, owner of Body First. Located at 2308 Anderson Ave., Body First offers spa treatments, a variety of massages, as well as a hair salon.

Massage techniques

Here is a list of some of the different types of massage techniques. The information is courtesy of the American Massage Therapy Association (www.amtamassage.org).

Deep tissue: helps to release chronic patterns of tension by using slow, deep strokes. It is called deep tissue because it also focuses on deeper muscle tissues.

Reflexology: massage based on points on feet and hands. There are specific spots that correspond to other parts of the body.

On-site massage (or chair massage): The client is fully clothed and placed in a special chair so the back, shoulders, neck and head are exposed for the massage therapist.

Swedish massage: Long kneading strokes are used. Considered the basis of most massages. Most chair massages include a form of Swedish massage.

Shiatsu and acupressure: Oriental-based system of finger-pressure to treat special points along acupuncture "meridians."

Sports massage: Massage therapy that focuses on muscle groups of a specific sport.

Swing City Jazz concert showcases local talent, various personality styles

By J. Scott Bowman
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Friday will be the last Swing City Jazz concert for the semester, but it will be a first-time opportunity for some musicians.

Four student jazz combos will be playing at the Manhattan Arts Center. Wayne Goins, director of jazz, will be playing as well as coaching students. Goins said he enjoys watching his students showcase their talents.

"I like it when they have the spotlight," Goins said. "I like to see them grow musically and interact with one another. They all have a different sound and approach, and you can really see each one of them sprouting into their own musical personality."

Goins said that there will be several different approaches to jazz and a variety of sounds. Some bands will offer a cool jazz feel, hot be-bop, Latin jazz, bossa novas as well as others. He said that there will be a sound for anyone.

"The Swing Machine is the top jazz combo for students," Goins said. "We all like to have fun, so we like it if people get up and dance and move around. People should come early because it will be standing room only."

Mike Katzif, junior in sociology, is one of the students who will be playing for the first time at the arts center. He has played guitar for nine years and has a variety of influences from classical to reggae.

He has been excited to get on stage and perform for the Swing City Jazz audience. This is what he had to say about the concert on Friday.

Q: Is there a specific person or group you like playing with?
A: I would have to say that the guys I'm with now, (Or Current Resident), are the best group of guys I could ask for in Manhattan. We all live together and are good friends and we can play whenever we want. I think that most of the best bands out there are great friends, and I think that shows.

Q: What do you like about playing with Wayne Goins?
A: Well, I study with him, so I'm in his office about every week, and he'll jam with me. He's shown a lot of wisdom, and the thing about him is, he knows how to teach music. He's probably the best music teacher I've ever had. With our group, he's given us a lot of freedom. He's helped with strengthening our soft spots. He's probably the best guitarist in Manhattan.

Q: What's your favorite part about playing in a jazz show?
A: I think the spontaneity. Of course we rehearse the main things we want to do, but there's always the chance for subtle changes to occur. It makes you nervous because those changes could really mess you up, but sometimes it can be really good. A live audience is fun because I think they appreciate bands that take risks like that.

Q: Is playing jazz music something you want to do for the rest of your life?
A: I think so that's my ultimate goal. I think it's hard to be involved in just music. But I want it to be a part of my life, like maybe I will help teach it or something. I think that would be a means to create more music and give me a chance to play more myself.

Musical 'Bombay Dreams' takes in $16 million at London box office

Andrew Lloyd Webber's hit musical "Bombay Dreams" has taken in $16 million at the box office, theater officials said.

More than 300,000 people have seen the show, which celebrates the Bollywood movie musicals of the Indian subcontinent.

"Bombay Dreams," which opened in June, celebrates its 200th performance Wednesday at the Apollo Victoria Theatre.

The show, with music by A.R. Rahman and lyrics by Don Black, focuses on a poor but handsome young man who dreams of becoming a Bollywood movie star. It's directed by Steven Pimlott, who directed the hit revival of the Lloyd Webber musical "Joseph and the Amazing Technicolor Dreamcoat."

After 25 years, Brunskwick bluegrass festival is taking a one-year break

Organizers of the Thomas Point Beach Bluegrass Festival — one of the largest bluegrass festivals on the East Coast — plan to take the year off in 2003.

The festival has taken place each Labor Day weekend for 25 years in Brunswick, Maine. Founder Pati Crooker says it's time for her staff to "have a breather."

Bluegrass stars who have performed at the event, which will return in 2004, include Bill Monroe, Alison Krauss, Ricky Skaggs and Del McCoury.

"I always thought I'd stop at 25 years," Crooker said recently. "But it's become a huge part of my life, of everyone's life. So I can't stop it for long."

Crooker owns Thomas Point Beach, a park where people pay fees to picnic, swim or camp. The park's business includes hosting company outings, reunions and weddings.

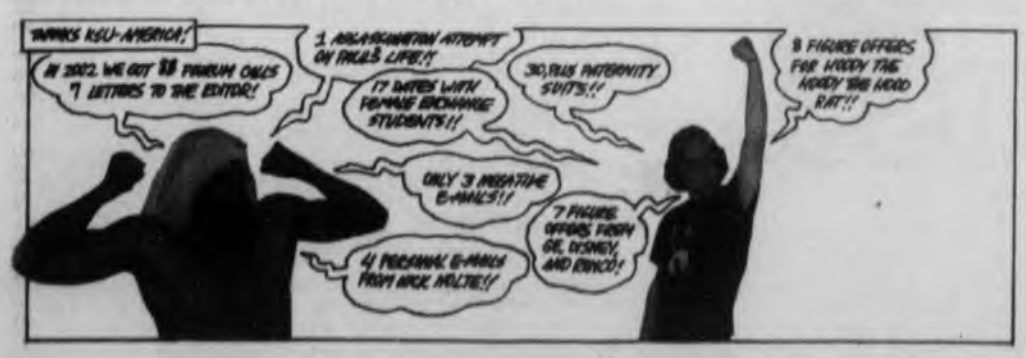
Remember to vote online for your choices for this year's top albums at www.kstatecollegian.com. So far, Eminem is winning all three categories for which he has been nominated. Final results will be printed early next semester.

LISTENING BOOTH

The Collegian wants to know what music you are listening to. If you are passionate about music and want to express you're opinion, e-mail A&E Editor JJ Duncan at jduncan_80@hotmail.com. This week we asked Patrick McGovern, sophomore in construction science, what he's playing.

1. James Taylor: "October Road"
This is his new album and I got it right when it came out. James Taylor's one of my favorite artists. I like his acoustic music quite a bit. This is one of my top five albums.

2. Phish: "Reba"
Phish is a really innovative band. They have a unique sound. I got into them because a friend of mine noticed that I listen to a lot of Pink Floyd, so he said I might like Phish.



3. Leo Kotke: "One Guitar, No Vocals"
He's known around the world as one of best 12-string guitar players. I've seen him in concert and he's incredible. The way he plays sounds like there's two or three guitars, but it's just him.

4. Old and in the Way: "Breakdown"
This is a bluegrass album with Jerry Garcia on banjo. They only played a few shows back in the '70s. A lot of it is traditional bluegrass, but it's Jerry Garcia style. I play mandolin and guitar, so when I got my mandolin, I started to listen to more bluegrass.

5. The Allman Brothers: "Greatest Hits"
That's the only Allman Brothers' album I have and I love their sound. It's raw rock n' roll. When I play guitar, that's the style I like to work on. I like "Dreams" a lot and "Little Martha" is a nice little acoustic song.

DRUNK | Drunken driving statistics show increase in December crashes

"It is just as serious as getting a gun and killing another person," he said.

"For most people who drink and drive, they have done it before."

Ugarte said that when he drives at night, he fears for his life.

"I have to protect myself," he said. "It is terrible, but there is no one else that will in this state."

Dealing with the problem

Since 1995, the percent of alcohol-related traffic fatalities in Kansas is about 40 percent per year.

That percent, which has been on the rise since the 1980s and early 1990s, is part of the reason the Kansas Drunk Driving Prevention Office has implemented programs to educate people about, and attempt to prevent, drunken driving.

Julie Faust, program specialist for KDDPO, said many people are just unaware of the laws associated with drunken driving and DUI's.

"With youth, many may not know what is in store for them if they are caught," Faust said. "People need to know laws when they start driving."

Education, Faust said, is the best way to attempt to prevent drunken driving, so it is vital for young people to hear about the consequences of getting behind the wheel after drinking.

Faust said statistics show that young drivers are most often the perpetrator of drunken driving.

"There is a high percentage with alcohol crashes and teenagers," she said.

"This is the area we need to educate."

Because the holidays are a high risk time for drunken driving, Faust said December is 3D month, which stands for National Drunk and Drug Driving Month.

During the holidays, drunken driving occurs more frequently because of parties and celebrations, Quintanar said, so the RCPD sometimes chooses to use sobriety checkpoints.

Although sobriety checkpoints may be seen as a trap to some, Quintanar said the point of them is not to try to intimidate people or scare the drivers.

He said the intention behind the checkpoints is to educate the public and make them aware that the police are on the lookout for drunken drivers.

Quintanar said although people pay attention to the information they hear regarding drunken driving, it is difficult to try to stop the problem using only educational methods.

"You can lead a horse to water but you can't make him drink," he said.

"You can't make a person not drink and drive. They either want to do it the right way or the wrong way."

Combating the problem

For people who have lost loved ones to drunken driving, no matter what is done to help combat the problem, it may never be enough.

Ugarte is convinced that schools like K-State need to have more education and support for students regarding alcohol and drunken driving.

"They have to be reminded," he said. "You must remind them by having education and by showing them what happens at an early age."

That is precisely what Matt Roots does for the Manhattan-Ogden USD 383.

Roots, the drug and alcohol prevention coordinator for USD 383, said he works to help students understand the effects of drunken driving by relaying information and exposing them to the dangers.

"The bottom line is that kids are kids, and they do need education at a young age," he said.

Roots said the Manhattan school district concentrates mostly on education about drugs and alcohol, but said there needs to be a balance between education and safety options for those students who do choose to use alcohol.

"The school's main focus is that we want to help the students," he said. "I think that is the way it should be. We should help them and not let it go by the wayside."

Brooke Davison, sophomore in accounting and president of Greeks Advocating the Mature Management of Alcohol, or GAMMA, said she understands college students know it is not OK to drink and drive, but it must be reinforced over and over again.

She said GAMMA is there to help students learn how to socialize around alcohol, but it is also an important educational tool for K-State.

"You lose people to drunk driving, and you don't want that to be the thing that changes you," she said. "You should realize that before."

Davison said GAMMA placed 31 white crosses on campus earlier this year to remind students that drinking and driving is never OK. The crosses symbolized the number of 18- to 24-year-olds who died last year in Kansas due to drunken driving.

Ugarte said he hopes there is a change in the amount of drunken drivers in Kansas, and in the Manhattan area. He said he believes that when students are educated and reminded, they will begin to think about the consequences of drunken driving.

"Accidents can happen, but with drinking, it is just the question of when it will happen," he said. "With drinking and driving, it is just a matter of time.

HART | Junior comes up big

with 19 points.

Hart hurt his thumb in the first game of the season against Brigham Young in the Paradise Jam Tournament, and he said the injury has had some effect on his performance on the court.

"It has, but I can't use that as an excuse," Hart said. "I just got to come out and do other things, find other ways to help my team win.

"With these disappointing losses and me not scoring, I felt like I had to come out and do something else to help my team win," Hart said. "That was really frustrating not being able to do that for my team"

Coach Jim Wooldridge said Hart's high threshold for pain has let him play through the nagging thumb injury.

"It's hard to say how bad that thing is hurt," he said. "He has a pretty high pain threshold I think. He started the year in October with some blisters that most people couldn't go out and play with, and he played and got through that.

"His hand might be really bothering him. I know he got it hit out there tonight, but he's told me that he's used to it, and he's going to play through it."

Hart connected on all three of his shots from behind the three-point line on the night, more than doubling his season total. Previously, he had only hit 11 percent of his three-pointers, making just two of 18 shots.

"It definitely felt good," Hart said. "Any time you're in a little drought, all shooters have a little drought where they're off a little bit. I could blame it on my hand or numerous things."

The three-point shot is something Hart said was key in Wednesday's game, because it helps the post players get easier shots.

"It really is important because we have to free up Pervis (Pasco) and Matt (Siebrandt) where they don't have to have to get double-teamed every night," he said. "When they do get double-teamed, we have to be there to knock it down so teams will have second thoughts about coming down and double-teaming them.

Hart said his slump wasn't that concerning to him because he was confident he could always find some way to help the team.

"I was always taught to look for my shot, and if it's not there to do other things for the team," he said.

"It just wasn't my night a few nights ago. Tonight was my night. I stepped up and hit a couple shots, and hopefully it will carry over through the next few games and throughout the season."

BASKETBALL | K-State cruises to 102-68 win over UTPA; Wildcats use contributions from 11 players to demolish Broncs

and doing so tonight was a huge confidence booster, Wooldridge said.

"We score 100 points a game, and I can promise you that we will be a successful team. That's one thing I can assure you," Wooldridge said.

The Wildcats shot 60 percent in the game, but nearly 10 minutes into the first half, K-State was shooting 96 percent. The Cats also came out of the gate hot in the second half. At one point, they were eight-for-11.

Wooldridge said playing so well on offense came as a breath of fresh air to a team that has lost so many low-scoring games.

The Cats haven't broken the 65-point barrier in any of their losses this season, but they've scored at least 75 in each of their wins. Wooldridge said playing a high-scoring game is very important for this team.

"It's tough to beat people when you're scoring 60 to 65 points," he said. "You're on a thin line with everything else about the game – defending the ball, the screens and the rebounds. We aren't going to score 100 points a game, but we have to get more than we have been getting."

To find those 100 points, K-State used 11 different scores.

Six scored in double figures, and all but two Cats who saw the court found the basket.

Down 2-5 early in the first half, K-State went on a 19-0 run. Five different players scored.

K-State built a 35-12 lead with 10 minutes left in the first half. That sense of security led the Cats to finish the first half sloppy, Wooldridge said.

"I didn't know what happened. Maybe the lead was the culprit there," he said.

"We didn't sustain our effort. We got a little lose, and we didn't get to some guys in transition, like the game was over in the first 10 minutes. But we regrouped, came back and played together."

All three of K-State's starting guards were able to crack the double figures.

Junior Jarrett Hart led all scorers with 19, and back-court companion Frank Richards was second, putting up 15 points.

Getting the guards into the action proved to be the key to the Cats' success, senior Matt Siebrandt said.

When the guards haven't been making their shots, he said teams have been playing a zone defense that allows them to put extra pressure on the forwards.

He said Wednesday night's solid outside shooting opened up the entire offense.

"They shot it so well tonight – that really helps our team," Siebrandt said. "That really opens it up down low and makes them have to guard everything.

"I was just happy to have a one-on-one matchup," he said.

"It's been a long time since we had a defense play us pretty straight up. It was fun to finally get to play again, not with zones or people packing it down low, that kind of gets frustrating."

Deans adjust to cuts

Mid-year cuts cause loss of programs, faculty campuswide

By Saran Rice
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

They are tired of cutting programs, staff positions and classes. They are tired of stretching dollars further than they can go.

K-State's deans are once again faced with cutting back the budget of their colleges as Gov. Bill Graves' mid-year cuts, announced Nov. 26, become a reality.

"You don't get a hit that big and it not hit you," said Dennis Law, dean of the College of Architecture, Planning and Design. "It affects us in our ability to carry on business as usual. We are using up every spare nickel we can rake and scrape together in an attempt to honor contracts."

John Struve, associate vice president of administration and finance, said the 3.9-percent cut already was planned for, but that doesn't make it any easier to cope with as projections are ringing true.

"It is more of a technical process of withdrawing money from the budget," Struve said. "Now we are moving from the planning stage to reality."

Becoming reality

Law knew cuts were coming.

"When we were told that we may have as much as 4 percent this year, we spent all fall trying to figure out how we were going to come up with that," he said. "It wasn't like we had to go into a renewed panic at that time."

For architecture students, this means more time at K-State.

"We have lost several staff and faculty positions just through attrition that we have not been able to fill," Law said. "There has to be a curricular response to massive budget cuts to a university. It may mean bigger classes. It may mean they have to spend a little more time here."

Student Senate to discern statistics

By Amy Link
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Student Senate is reviewing the results of a pilot program that allowed students to pick up free newspapers on campus.

USA Today's Collegiate Readership Program included The Kansas City Star, The Manhattan Mercury, The New York Times and USA Today. The Topeka Capital-Journal was later added because of a donation by the publisher.

The program lasted four weeks, and USA Today conducted a student interest survey.

Jennifer Gregory, senior account manager for USA Today, said the program was well received by K-State students.

CNS plans to standardize electronic IDs

Students, faculty will be able to register for eIDs

By Tony Herrman
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The days of having different identifications and passwords for every K-State computing function will soon be history.

In January 2003, IDs for Unix – the central web server, the K-State home page, the Netscape calendar system and university computing labs – will be replaced by an electronic identifier, or eID.

KATS will begin using eIDs in March, and K-State Online and the Division of Continuing Education will begin using them next fall.

"eID stands for electronic identifier and is unique for each individual to give them access to (InfoTech) resources, and it

Above: On a tree in Anderson's lawn, Sparky K. Nut, senior in journalism and mass communications, practices her graduation walk. "It hasn't been quite four years," she said, "but graduating in three and a half is such an accomplishment. The only negative is that I'll have to find my own tree to live in and fight the other squirrels for food this winter." Left: Sobbing after her sister's graduation, Spanky R. Nut, 16, resorts to eating leaves. "I don't know what I'll do now that she is really an adult," Spanky said. "I don't want her to move away. I'd rather eat leaves and grass all year than see my sister move farther away than she already is."

Experts offer tips for giving

By Pete Elsasser
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Local charities are turning to individuals to come through with support, especially because corporate donorship has decreased for some organizations.

But donors need to watch out for scams, local officials say.

Shirley Bramhall, executive director of the Flint Hills Breadbasket, said it's important to know a charity before giving money. She said people can visit charities or look up information online. For reports about organizations, people can check www.give.org, which has Better Business Bureau Wise Giving Alliance reports about charities.

"People are giving their hard-earned money," she said. "They need to have a comfort level about that charity."

Bramhall said anyone can help support charities during the holiday season, even students. Bramhall said the Breadbasket is looking for holiday meats, but it will appreciate canned goods, volunteer service and donations.

"There's no small donation," she said. "If you donate a dollar, that's more than we had before."

Anand Desai, associate professor and head of the Department of Finance, recommends finding percentages charities use for charitable purposes and how much is used for expenses.

"Those percentages can vary from 10 to 40 percent depending on the charity," he said. "The preferred one is where the majority goes to the charity itself."

Desai said people sometimes prefer the money donated to a charity stay local. He said verifying the legitimacy is important, and receipts are essential.

"Be careful about requests for donations over the phone," he said. "If a charity is willing to mail information, then I'd be willing to support it."

Bramhall said she credits individual support to the Midwest mentality of being generous.

"Businesses are cutting back because of the economy while need is going up," Bramhall said. "We need individual help now more than ever."

A closer look

Familiar charities best bet

By Erica Gonzales
TEXAS TECH UNIVERSITY DAILY

LUBBOCK, Texas - Holiday shoppers beware: Although several charities are in need of donations this holiday season, some of them might be scams.

There are several ways to keep from getting scammed this year, said Nan Campbell, president of the Better Business Bureau.

"We have many local charities that use this time of the year for their main fund raising," she said.

Charities that don't have the public interest may use similar names to better known ones.

Since Sept. 11, she said, she has received many calls asking about the validity of charities.

No holiday scams have been reported to the Better Business Bureau in Lubbock yet, she said.

However, it is important to be cautious when making a monetary donation, she said.

"A good charity would be more than happy to wait for a donation," she said.

Major Mark Satterlee, coordinator for the Salvation Army, said they have an annual report available to the public and also are listed with other charities on the Better Business Bureau.

He said people know the Salvation Army is valid because volunteers pick up donations.

"We are the only ones who pick them up and the only ones who take them," he said. "We never go door to door, we never dress as Santa Claus, and we never ask for money over the phone," he said.

CUTS | Campus department heads adjusting budgets

At the College of Agriculture, the additional cuts could mean a loss of programs and staff positions when the college is recovering. And with mid-year cuts, Dean Marc Johnson has had to eliminate 4.8 percent of his budget.

The teaching program will be left with positions unfilled. Classified positions, vacant now, will be eliminated.

"We can handle our teaching reductions because there are people leaving mid year," Johnson said.

"But that absolutely saps us dry. If we were to have another reduction in the spring, I have no place to take it from."

Agriculture students will find the subject-specific classes once offered are no longer available.

"We take our line schedule as a contract, so we have figured out ways to meet classes that are in the line schedule, but by the same token, we cut out six full-time teachers from the College of Ag," Johnson said. "The departments are going about figuring out what classes and other experiences to remove. The students will have the same number of credit hours to take, but there will likely be a narrower range of classes to select from."

Research facilities off campus will have to cut classified positions, laboratory and reduce research opportunities also.

Dennis Kuhlman, dean of the College of Technology and Aviation, said he is leaving five positions unfilled.

"We planned for the potential of this level of cut," Kuhlman said.

"We have eliminated some of the new equipment purchases planned for this year.

Looking ahead

The future doesn't look bright for the budget. Projections show 2004 will be worse, with more cuts expected.

"All areas are so underfunded," Struve said. "We don't know what is in store for us when the Legislature comes back into session. It is a significant concern that we could go by our worst case planning."

Law will staff reducing staff. Johnson has already begun identifying programs that may not be vital to the college.

"What we are doing is identifying programs, establishing criteria to distinguish programs from very important to important, and we will be discussing these programs against the criteria. We will be making decisions by April about what our essential programs are and what programs are not necessarily essential."

In Salina, Kuhlman is also preparing for future cuts.

"I've asked my unit heads to look at best-case and worst-case scenarios," he said. "I've asked them to look at If we only have this amount of funds, how we're going to complete our mission."

But, Kuhlman said, the students are the first priority.

"Our goal is to protect our students," he said. "I hope that right now it isn't going to affect our students in terms of being able to complete their goals."

Staying positive

Each time a cut is announced, fear increases.

"Morale is pretty strong, but it is affected by fear of losing jobs, fear of losing colleagues or fear of losing thesupport necessary to be successful in a career," Johnson said.

If the fear of losing a job isn't present, faculty are frustrated with an end to pay increases.

"It is tough to maintain a real positive attitude," Kuhlman said. "When you dedicate your life to an institution that can't give a pay increase or even a cost of living increase. The morale is positive, but I am not saying that will remain if the state continues to not allow us to reward our faculty for the job they are doing."

Despite the frustration, Kuhlman said he is impressed with his faculty's attitude.

"It has been amazing to me that our faculty are dedicated professionals," he said. "I am proud and the approach they are taking to higher education."

Administrators don't expect the next few years to be easy.

"It is increasingly difficult to deal with," Struve said, "but we will."

ONLINE | Campus to adopt eIDs next semester

also serves as an e-mail address," said Harvard Townsend, director of Computing and Network Services.

Rebecca Gould, director of InfoTech services, said eIDs will be useful because they simplify computing activity.

"An eID takes the place of the computing ID," she said. "This means a limited number of passwords and IDs for computer access."

The switch to eIDs is also a matter of safety in addition to convenience, Chuck Gould, senior analyst for CNS, said.

"eIDs enhance security by reducing the number of IDs and passwords an individual has to remember," he said.

"As more and more resources use an eID, it will become more important to the individual."

Townsend explained how the eIDs will work.

"The eID is an identifier to prove it's really you, and the password is the authentification," he said.

Beginning Jan. 6 for faculty and Feb. 3 for students, a first come-first serve eID registration will begin. Faculty and students will be able to register their eIDs once for free, through Feb. 28.

After Feb. 28, or if users wants to register their eIDs, there will be a $50 admission charge.

Unlike computing IDs, which are recycled after the user has left K-State, an eID will belong to the user forever, provided the eID is used at least once every five years.

"Once a K-Stater, always a K-Stater," Rebecca Gould said.

Users may register their eIDs on the Web site, eid.k-state.edu, in addition to registering at the InfoTech office at 313 Hale Library, Chuck Gould said.

"The Web site initially will provide information about the eID to K-State," he said. "In late December, when the eID becomes active, this Web site will become the location where you can log in and manage information about your electronic identity such as e-mail forwarding and aliases."

Aliases are alternate names for a user, which will allow for greater creativity than the eID, Chuck Gould said.

"An eID is constrained to three to eight characters in length and does not contain special characters," he said. "Aliases provide an opportunity to have an e-mail address that is longer, and perhaps more descriptive."

TO THE POINT

Faculty deserves recognition for their hard work

K-State faculty have long been expecting not to receive pay increases for the second year in a row. The ever-looming budget crises just won't allow for it.

And it's going to get worse before it gets better.

Yet, in spite of stagnant wages, the cancelation of classes and the increases in some class sizes, professors still are remaining positive about their situations.

They have a passion for what they do.

But how long is that passion going to last if their situations do not improve? The faculty are the backbone of the university. They are the ones interacting with and helping students, and are therefore the most crucial to the success of the university. Alternative incentives need to be presented to keep them from deciding to look for work elsewhere.

Gratitude is a place to start.

We should recognize our instructors and praise them for a job well done in the midst of adversity. It's time to appreciate all their hard work and commend their abilities to stick things out during tough times.

We at the Collegian acknowledge the challenges our professors have had to face, and we applaud them for continuing to educate students to the best of their capabilities.

To the point is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

MESSAGE LOST

Repetitive carols put coal-sized damper on spirit of Christmas season

ANDREW LAWSON

It's hard to forget the Christmas season has arrived when you walk into any retail store.

Perhaps the first details you'll notice are the familiar tunes of Christmas being blared over the intercom.

Maybe I'm just feeling a little more Scrooge-like than usual this year, but I for one am getting tired of the same old Christmas carols.

Forget Avril Lavigne. I bet if you look at the statistics, some of the Yuletide classics are the most overplayed songs out there. They are a staple in the early educations of most American children. As a result, we're all brainwashed into knowing them verbatim. There's no escape.

Perhaps I wouldn't mind so much if I didn't always hear the exact same versions. Come on, some of these renditions are decades old.

Take Gene Autry's "Rudolph the Red-Nosed Reindeer," for instance. This has been around for so long that everybody even knows the joke throw-in lines.

Like Monopoly!

See what I mean? If you didn't understand that, you're luckier than you realize.

Bing Crosby, Nat King Cole, Dean Martin, Burl Ives – sure, they're the great crooners, but they appeal more to my grandparents' generation. Can we get a new take on an old theme, at least?

Whoops, I should be more careful what I wish for. If you've ever heard Boyz II Men sing "Silent Night," you're probably thinking along the same lines as me:

"Give me the old guys any day; at least they've got talent!"

Even Elmo & Patsy's satirical "Grandma Got Run Over by a Reindeer," which seemed so fresh and innovative a decade ago, has acquired the familiarity of an old sweater.

I thought for years that Mannheim Steamroller and Trans-Siberian Orchestra were collective geniuses, not for their original reinterpretations of Christmas carols, but for daring to create new holiday material.

Unfortunately, some corporate conglomerate found out about them and ruined that, too.

I recently discovered how far this cancer has spread.

You've heard of the "Now That's What I Call Music" albums, right? You know, the collections of the worst, most overrated singles to cross the airwaves.

Well, now you can be the proud owner of "Now That's What I Call Christmas," for $19.95, plus $3.95 shipping and handling. Act now, supplies are limited.

Is commercialism to blame for this travesty as well? After all, retailers already have taken the fun out of every other aspect of Christmas.

Usually, when record companies find something that works, they reproduce it endlessly, always looking for the "new hit" in the old style. Here, though, the evil powers-that-be have chosen to just endlessly repackage the original material.

The root of the problem lies deeper than corporate America wanting to milk a cash dairy farm. Almost all our secular concepts of Christmas, like Santa Claus, Frosty and Rudolph are based on these songs. I can't really point to a mass medium that has affected our notions of Christmas more profoundly.

Thus, the proliferation of these songs ensures that the end result of these secular concepts – holiday shopping – continues to thrive.

As a final thought, I find it interesting that most religious songs are not victimized this way. The ones that are usually feature a helpless, non-speaking baby Jesus.

How convenient.

After all, one of his most important messages is the way in which he embraced poverty and generosity. If more people heard that message outside of church, maybe Toys 'R' Us, Virgin Records and their brethren would have to practice poverty as well.

It might be hard to forget the Christmas season has arrived, but it sure is easy to forget that "Jesus is the reason for the season."

What has the Fourum come to when we resort to using Shania Twain lyrics in our comments? Come on. Shania Twain. Yeah, OK.

Cowboy logic: ride bull, meet nurses.

Is it just me or do panties just turn me on?

I do have to admit, my girlfriend agrees with me that the scent of panties is great.

Um, I smelled my girlfriend's panties the other day, and they smelled like poop. Oops, it must have been the wrong part.

Does it always smell like curry in your math and economics classes?

Two in one week? I made out with two boys in one night. Beat that.

Oh yeah, and they were roommates. Go, me.

K-State tuition: $1,800. Books: $400. Beer: $500. A whole group of friends? I don't know. Ask the greeks.

Small-town life offers many creative ways to entertain yourself

KATHRYN HOLLINGSWORTH

You know you're from a small town when:

- running from the cops consists of hiding in the cornfield.
- you have to name six surrounding towns to explain to people where you're from.
- you have to drive five miles out in the country to smoke a cigarette.
- headline news is who grew the biggest vegetable.
- there is no point in high-school reunions because everyone knows what everyone else is doing anyway.

City dwellers tend to pity those of us who grew up amid farms and churches, but they will never know the simple joys of small town living. We didn't have much to do, but our creativity and strong determination to have fun made up for a lack of environment.

When life shuts down around 8:30 p.m. it looks like a ghost town. On a Saturday night between sport seasons, time hangs on a crisp fall night. But under this facade of peaceful Mayberry was the twitching of teenage adrenaline. In Montezuma, Kan., there were at least four activities that kept us entertained.

1. Main Street

Driving down the main drag is a universal high school experience. However, driving a golf cart, a pickup truck with a couch in the back, a grain cart, go-cart, or any other number of inventions is restricted to people with too much time on their hands. Parking outside of quick-shops and small town cafes to talk, fight, and flirt with car stereos booming is Saturday night in a small town.

2. Country cruising

When dragging main lost its luster for the evening, the next best thing was "country cruising," also known as "ag touring." This consisted of shoving as many people as possible in a pickup truck or car with a case of cheap beer and driving down country roads. When the country road became boring, stopping by miscellaneous "haunted" houses was the next thing to wrap up a fun-filled evening.

3. Cow tipping

I don't think it is possible to tip a cow without a truck. However, it's fun to try. Gathering a group of 10 to tramp through a pasture to disturb sleeping, defenseless animals is the epitome of fun. When cow-tipping is passé, the next step is to light something on fire. Hence, the bonfire – the official beginning to a "pasture party." It's like tailgating – except you are in the middle of nowhere, and there are a lot more people losing their pants.

4. Playing with nature

The forces of nature are welcomed as a haphazard way of spicing up the options to fill time. When a blizzard struck, we pulled out the inner tubes and pickup trucks and went sledding. It's insane to find an old rope and a deflating inner tube and coast behind a truck going 40 miles an hour – but boy, was it fun.

Sometimes I wonder how we are still alive. A majority of the activities we deemed as fun were psychotic. But that is why it was so much fun.

Where you live is what you make it. When I tell people I grew up in Montezuma, their first thought is, "Oh, I'm sorry, that must have sucked!"

You know what – it didn't. College is fun and I love Manhattan. But some of the best memories I'll ever have are dedicated to the crazy things I did back where there was "nothing to do."

Editor reflects on term

No teary farewell from writer ready for leisure time

SEAN PURCELL

A final column for the sports editor.

Some teary remarks or sentimental feelings to end the semester? What about a chance to vent now that no one can do anything?

Nah.

It was a great semester for K-State sports and the Collegian, thanks to Bill Snyder, Suzie Fritz, Amy Mortimer and Darren Sproles, just to name a few.

Because K-State thrived this fall season, my job was made easier.

I couldn't imagine what it was like for that poor fall sports editor of 2001 who had to struggle through a football season of disappointments and mishaps.

And it wasn't just football.

The volleyball team showed just how deep they were last year. Losing studs Liz Wegner, Lisa Mimick and Jayne Christen, the Cats still reloaded and went on one of the most amazing winning streaks I have ever seen.

You just have to understand where I am coming from, I guess. Those volleyball girls will always have a spot in my heart.

In sports not so mainstream here on campus, cross country runner Amy Mortimer did what she always does, achieve All-America status. For solo sport, Amy gets my vote for Performance of the Year.

Building on that, how about those Collegian postseason football awards?

I know several of you (maybe everyone) were upset to not see Terence Newman named the Defensive Player of the Year, but seriously, getting mad over what a college paper has to say – how lame is that?

So because it was such a great semester, and in light of the awards we handed out this week, here are some picks by your friendly neighborhood sports editor. I will be back next semester, just to write, so you aren't completely free from what I have to say. I might even pop up on your TV screen here soon. Details later.

Most quotable Wildcat

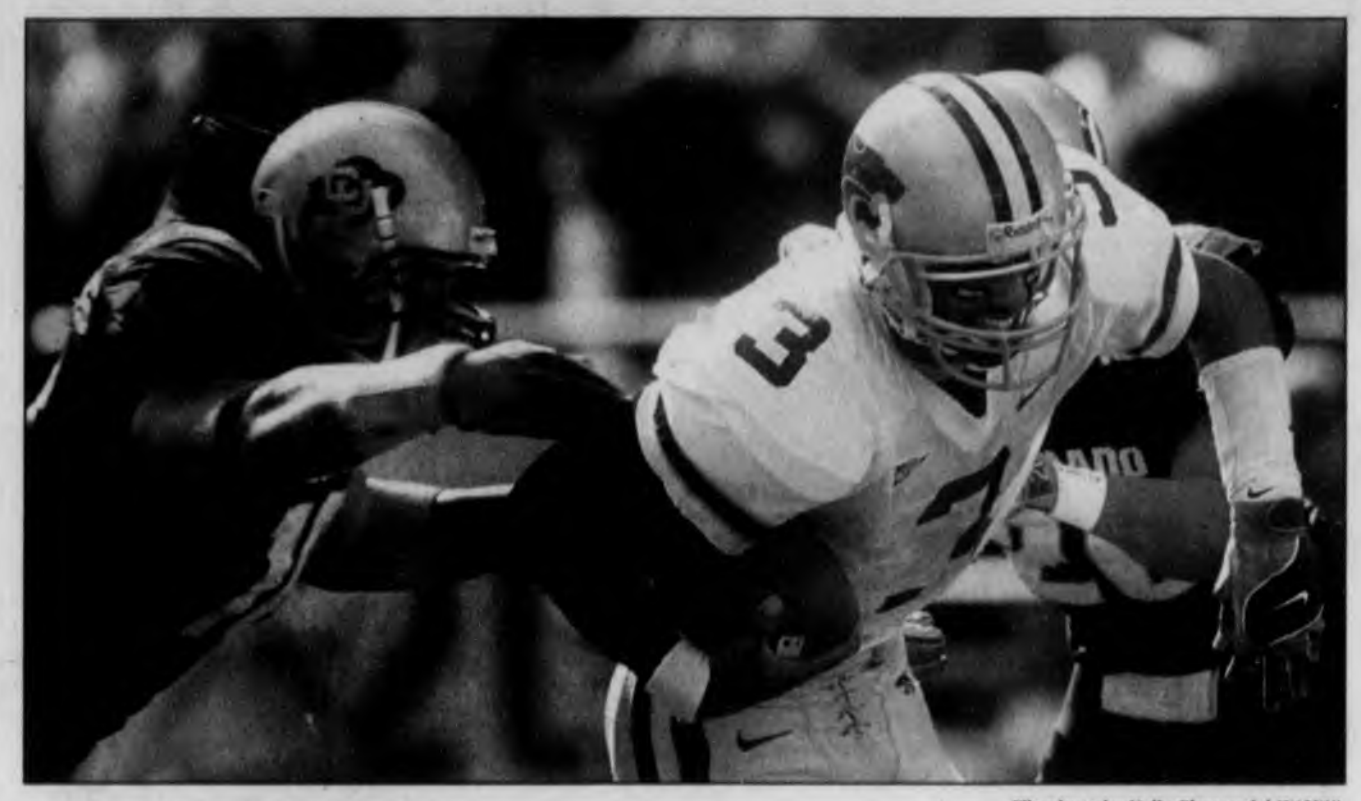
Andrew Shull, hands down. The quote he gave me comparing how close Missouri was to being 8-3 to how close K-State was to playing for national championship, that was money Shull. I appreciate that one.

Here is the quote.

"They're as close as – what is it seven points that separates us from being national champions – they are that many from having one or two losses."

Favorite interview

Suzie Fritz. Two years ago, when I was first put on the volleyball beat, the award would not go to her. Maybe that's because I didn't know a dang thing about the sport. Now, you can't keep me away. Like I have said before, if you want to get the most bang for your buck, go to a volleyball match.



Favorite moment of the semester

I took a writer who had never covered a football game before to the Western Kentucky contest to break him in. Thinking nothing could go wrong, I was shocked to see him pumping his fist as Bobby Walker returned an interception 73 yards for a score. I don't think I have ever

In so many ways, K-State progressed from a year ago.

A 6-6 record in 2001. A 10-2 mark in 2002. What was the difference?

Ell Roberson.

Roberson is the inaugural Collegian Player of Year because he decided not to be mediocre anymore. He stood up and became a leader for this top-10 Wildcat team. He proved just how good he can really be.

"I think he should be up for Heisman, personally," wide receiver James Terry said after Roberson ran for 228 yards against Nebraska.

"In every big game, he just steps up to the plate and plays."

Roberson arguably peaked at the right time for the Cats this season.

Men hope to use momentum against WSU

Cats looking for more confidence before Big 12 play

By Joel Reichenberger
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Coach Jim Wooldridge has said all along that his team needed to play a fast-paced, high-scoring game to win.

On Wednesday night, fans may have finally caught a glimpse of what that style of play could do for their struggling team. The Cats scored 102 points in a 34-point victory over Texas-Pan American.

"The whole game was centered around energy – running the floor and being a proactive team," Wooldridge said.

On Saturday, Wooldridge and the Wildcats will try to take their run-and-shoot offense to do battle with rival Wichita State.

After losing two in a row to the Shockers, the Cats are anxious to try to get the monkey off their back, senior Matt Siebrandt said.

"It's a big game since I've lost both times since I've been here," Siebrandt said. "We want to go down there and play well as a team."

The Cats also hope to use Saturday's game to gain some momentum before they start conference play early next month.

Wooldridge said the Cats need to win some games now so that they can have the confidence to win games further down the road.

"We have talked about how important this month is to us," he said. "It takes more success to build confidence to get ready to play in this league."

Wecker scores 31 in women's win at Wisconsin-Green Bay

Women top Phoenix, end UWGB's 13-game home winning streak

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

Kendra Wecker's 31 points helped No. 7 K-State stave off another upset bid by Wisconsin-Green Bay with an 80-75 victory over the Phoenix on Thursday night.

The Wildcats (9-1) nearly joined the growing list of Green Bay's victims before finally outlasting the Phoenix (6-2) with its superior size and sharpshooting.

The Wildcats didn't breath easy until Megan Mahoney's two free throws with 4.2 seconds left capped the scoring.

The Phoenix, who got 23 points from Sara Boyer and 18 from Chandra Johnson, had won six straight overall and 13 in a row at home. They were hoping for an upset that would vault them into the Top 25 for the first time in history.

Green Bay led 59-55 with just under 8 minutes left, but Wecker hit a 3-pointer to spark the K-State comeback.

Chelsea Domenico's first basket of the game, a 3-pointer, capped a 10-2 Wildcats run that gave K-State a 65-61 lead with six minutes left, and K-State never trailed again.

Laurie Koehn added 16 points for the Wildcats, who led 42-39 at halftime.

The Wildcats jumped took 16-7 lead behind Wecker's 11 points. But when she went cold and missed six straight shots, the Phoenix surged to a 28-27 edge on Boyer's basket with 7:05 left in the first half.

Under Kevin Borseth, Green Bay has had three straight 20-victory seasons and four consecutive conference crowns.

Wildcats win again

K-State won on the road last night, outlasting Wisconsin-Green Bay 80-75. Here are some statistical leaders from Thursday night's game.

- Kendra Wecker — 31 points, 13 rebounds
- Laurie Koehn — 16 points, three for six from three-point range
- Nicole Ohlde — 13 points, 10 rebounds

NFL | Moss pleads guilty

Minnesota Vikings wide receiver Randy Moss pleaded guilty Thursday to two minor traffic charges related to a traffic altercation in September.

Two other traffic counts and a marijuana charge were dismissed as part of a plea agreement.

Moss, who did not appear in court, was ordered to pay $1,200 in fines and sentenced to 30 days in jail by Hennepin County District Judge Mark Wernick. Moss was given two days' credit for time already served, and the rest of his sentence will be stayed as long as Moss doesn't commit any similar driving offenses, the judge said.

NFL | Warner put on injured reserve

Kurt Warner's troubled season officially came to an end Thursday when the St. Louis Rams placed him on injured reserve.

Warner will miss his second game with a broken bone in his throwing hand Sunday against the Cardinals. He was sidelined for five games earlier in the year with a broken pinkie on the same hand.

Wide receiver Dane Looker was elevated from the practice squad to take Warner's spot on the 53-man roster.

Warner, the NFL's MVP two of the last three years, talked optimistically Wednesday about returning before the end of the season.

But the Rams have concerns about his hand, which has had three breaks since 2000.

NCAA | Alabama may have a coach soon

New Orleans Saints assistant coach Mike Riley was considering an offer to become Alabama's next coach, according to published reports Thursday.

Riley, who played for Crimson Tide coach Bear Bryant as a defensive back in the early 1970s, was offered the job by Alabama athletic director Mal Moore, The Birmingham News and The Tuscaloosa News reported in Thursday's editions.

Both reports, quoting anonymous sources, said Riley would inform Moore of his decision Thursday.

Mankato sheds bluegrass style, tries out electric-rock sounds for Gumby's performance tonight

By JJ Duncan
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

If you missed Mankato Thursday night with the Pembertons, you will get another chance to hear its new sound tonight at Gumby's Pizza and Pub.

Known for its acoustic bluegrass-influenced sound, guitarist and vocalist Nathan Page said Mankato has adopted a new approach to its music.

"We have a new sound and a new drummer," he said. "And we've put away the acoustic guitars for a more electric-rock sound."

Though Page has been performing solo for quite some time, Mankato has only been together since the summer, joining Page with bassist Doug Bodily and drummer Travis Edwards.

The band has played Gumby's in the past, and this time singer-songwriter Mandy will open the show.

Matt Elliott | COLLEGIAN

Nathan Page, singer and guitarist, performs at Auntie Mae's Parlor with his band, Mankato. "Auntie Mae's is putting Manhattan on the map. It's awesome to play here because the wood acts as an acoustic guitar — makes for a better sound," he said.

Here is what Page had to say about what the band has been up to.

Q: Will you guys be recording soon?

A: We're hoping to go into the studio next weekend at M&M to make a demo E.P. We've just been hanging out, playing and writing songs lately.

Q: Have you had to change your approach to songwriting much since using a more electric sound?

A: I still write the songs on an acoustic guitar, and by the time I take it to practice, we work out a more electric sound. It works for the live situation now, but I'm not sure if we're going to keep doing it that way. We'll probably still record with both acoustic and electric, but for live stuff the electric is working better.

We've played some tough crowds around here, and sometimes it's easier for them to hear the rock. It still sounds good and I like it right now. I still like doing acoustic singer-songwriter music, too, when I play solo. I just have to stay sober enough during gigs that I can maintain that kind of set.

Q: Are you able to keep the bluegrass feel with electric guitars?

A: It's tough to keep the bluegrass sound. We're still playing all the same songs, and we have some with that bluegrass shuffle feel. It's tough for me to say what it sounds like, but we aren't as bluegrass as we were. There's only a couple of songs we've quit playing.

I've had to keep it in mind that I'm writing more for a rock trio than an acoustic band. I still love bluegrass, but I don't write it as well as some people.

Choir spots in 'Messiah' open to public, soloists already set

Residents invited to participate in musical show

By Courtney Duffield
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Local citizens will get the chance to perform Handel's "Messiah" on Saturday evening at All Faiths Chapel.

Penny Senften, executive director of the Manhattan Arts Center, said anyone who would like to sing in "Messiah" needs to show up Saturday at 2 p.m. so they can practice until about 4:30.

"It's a sing along," Senften said "Anybody can come and sing."

Senften said there are soloists and instrumentalists that have already been chosen to sing and play in the performance. Reginald Pittman, assistant professor of music, will conduct the performance.

"It's really just people we know," Senften said "Mostly the conductor chooses the performers."

William Wingfield, music instructor, said he had accompanied the performance before. He said he enjoys the experience because the music is challenging and it gives him an opportunity to work with people he knows from the community choir.

"It's one of the masterpieces." Wingfield said.

"It's pretty challenging because it's contrapuntal, which means it has several melodies and that makes it challenging for a pianist.

"The cello plays the bass line and that leaves me free to concentrate on the upper chorus," Wingfield said. "The trumpet plays in only some of the pieces, but adds nice color."

Pittman, who has been the conductor for six years, said between 40 and 50 people usually arrive to be in the choir. Music is provided and dress is casual.

Messiah has two parts: Christmas and Easter. They can be played together or separate and at any time during the year. Pittman said the vocal pieces in "Messiah" will be recognizable to most people.

Senften said the most recognizable piece is probably the "Halleluiah Chorus." This will be the sixth-annual performance of "Messiah."

"I started it because there is something like it in London," Senften said.

Hendel's 'Messiah'
- When: 7:30 p.m. Saturday
- Where: All Faiths Chapel
- To be in the chorus: arrive at 2 p.m.
- Admission: Free with recommended donation of $4 to benefit the Manhattan Arts Center, or canned goods to benefit Flint Hills Breadbasket

Senften said there is no charge to attend the concert, but they are asking for either a $4 donation to benefit the Manhattan Arts Center or canned goods for the Flint Hills Breadbasket.

Pittman said performing the piece is a great experience.

"The main reason why we do this is just for the opportunity." Pittman said. "It's just a musically rewarding composition to sing. It is one of the masterpieces of oratorios.

Seventeen films eligible to compete for feature animation Oscar

Seventeen films are eligible to compete for the 2002 feature animation Oscar, including the part live-action "Stuart Little 2."

Among the nominees are four from Disney: "Lilo & Stitch," "Return to Never Land," "Treasure Planet" and "Spirited Away," a 2001 Japanese film released in English this year.

"Spirited Away" is eligible despite its 2001 overseas debut because award regulations allow a one-year grace period for international movies, John Pavlik, spokesman for the Academy of Motion Picture Arts and Sciences, said Wednesday.

Movie studios target pirated DVDs sold by online auction sites

The movie studios are playing Grinch to Internet pirates selling unauthorized DVDs as holiday gifts over online auction sites.

The Motion Picture Association of America filed federal civil lawsuits against people in eight states Tuesday, accusing them of copyright infringement for offering hundreds of pirated DVDs over auction sites.

The lawsuits mark the first time the MPAA has focused on sales over such sites. They were filed against people in California, New Jersey, Virginia, Alabama, Florida, Nevada, Kansas and Connecticut.

James Bond flick 'Die Another Day' retakes top weekend box-office spot

ROBERSON | Junior quarterback's poise makes him team's sparkplug

In K-State's final four games, Roberson passed for more than 150 yards in three of them. In the one game during that stretch he failed to pass for 100 yards – Nebraska – he was too busy rushing for the most yards by any QB in school history.

Roberson said he could see the difference in his game this year not just on the field, but in the locker room and during practice.

"I am a much better leader," he said.

"I feel more comfortable playing with this offense, knowing what I have to do. Going out there, I just have to put all of it together and hopefully do well."

However, the season didn't begin as Roberson might have hoped.

He wasn't No. 1.

Senior Marc Dunn was the Cats' opening day starter, and remained No. 1 until the Southern California game.

But Dunn, and K-State, was struggling against the Trojan defense.

That's when Coach Bill Snyder elected to go to Roberson – it was the 12:52 mark in the second quarter.

Roberson threw for 134 yards that day, leading the Cats to victory. He would never relinquish the position back to Dunn.

"What I share with them quite frequently is that the only real losers in life are the ones that don't learn from the mistakes that we make," Snyder said of his team after the Missouri game.

"Our players realized that if things are going to happen, you have to make them happen."

In our eyes, Roberson led the charge in the attempt to always get better.

For that, he is our Player of the Year.

A 10-2 record, a berth to the Holiday Bowl and a top-10 finish – that's improvement.

One can only hope that Roberson, and the Cats, can do it even better next season.

Roberson then and now

Eli Roberson was a much improved player this year. Here are his stats from 2001 and 2002.

2001
- 40 percent completion rate
- 855 passing yards
- 13 total touchdowns
- 643 rushing yards

2002
- 54 percent completion rate
- 1367 passing yards
- 19 total touchdowns
- 969 rushing yards

laughed so hard.

Some closing remarks

I would be lying if I said I was sad to see the semester come to an end. The break is much needed.

Life as the sports editor of a Division-I college paper was fun, but it was rough. No time for friends, less time trying to find a girl.

But that's journalism for you. The people you see the most are who you write about every day – the volleyball girls, the football guys. That's what kept me going through the tough times. I never strived to produce a quality product on page six of the Collegian for my own ego, or for the people I work with.

I did it for the people who turned to that page of the paper and read the stories from beginning to end.

I did it for the people who spend hours a week practicing and preparing, striving to carry on the Wildcat tradition.

I did it for them.

AIRPORTS | Changes at airports make traveling more efficient, safe

attacks, completed its security takeover of airports to meet the deadline to put more than 47,000 federal employees in place – including at Manhattan Regional Airport.

"The addition of the federalized screeners has increased our security level greatly," Russ Johnson, airport director, said. "It actually seems to improve the process."

Those improvements – shorter and quicker lines at security checkpoints – have many travelers praising the efficiency of the new screeners.

"The process of flying is actually starting to be less of a hassle," said Annina Micheli, junior in animal science, who flew home to California during Thanksgiving break.

The screeners are trained by TSA and will handle security at 424 airports nationwide.

"The process is smoother, in many ways, because they are a professional staff," Johnson said. "They make the process much more efficient."

Travelers should still arrive about an hour before their flight, Johnson said, even though the new security measures should only take about 15 to 20 minutes.

At Kansas City International Airport, the security procedures are almost identical even though the airport is one of five nationwide participating in a federal pilot program allowing private companies to provide screening.

"The private screeners receive the same training that the federal screeners receive and their security procedures are identical," Joe McBride, spokesperson for KCI, said.

The mandates for security screeners – private or federally regulated – include 44 hours of classroom work and 60 hours of on-the-job training. In addition, the employees must go through an extensive criminal background check, be U.S. citizens, have a high school diploma or the equivalent and be proficient in English.

Travel tips

For holiday traveling tips, go to www.tsatraveltips.com.

Those high standards have translated into few complaints from passengers.

"I haven't heard any," McBride said. "I expect that they feel comfortable with the screeners."

Seth Chapman, who went to Las Vegas around Thanksgiving, said he noticed a difference in security checkpoints at KCI.

"We went to Las Vegas last year in November, we waited forever in lines and we were all searched," Chapman, senior in biochemistry, said. "This year, we didn't have to wait in line once. The two girls I was flying with had their purses searched, but it went fast, too."

McBride said lines at KCI averaged about a five-minute wait the week of Thanksgiving, which he says is better than the national average.

"Couple that with 17 checkpoint options and more people employed to handle the screening process, and you will see quicker lines," he said. "However, the security is not being compromised, the screeners are just much more efficient."

However, Micheli tells a different story about flying out of the airport in Sacramento.

"I haven't noticed much of a decrease in lines at the security checkpoints," said Micheli, who flies five to six times a year. "They are still pretty long. Kansas City was OK, but the line at Sacramento was still pretty long. I probably waited about 20 minutes at the security checkpoints."

TSA is still working on improving those waits, though. Officials are also starting to change the way travelers are screened after passing through those security checkpoints. Rather than checking some passengers at every gate, only travelers at randomly selected gates will have to be searched.

Micheli was selected to be randomly searched.

"I had to take shoes off, undo my belt and roll down the top of my pants," she said. "It didn't take too long, but it was definitely a hassle."

Still, Micheli said she understands why she was asked.

"I feel pretty confident flying because I know they are doing their job," she said.

Parking rules

In December, the federal government also started opening parking lots that have been off-limits since Sept. 11 because of worries about car bombs.

The prohibition on unattended vehicles parking within 300 feet of a terminal will remain dropped as long as the terrorist threat level is at code yellow, or "elevated," the middle of a five-point scale of risk developed after the terrorist attacks, Robert Johnson, Transportation Security Administration spokesman said.

Airports are required to outline plans explaining how they would deal with the threat of an explosion. Then they won't have to close the parking areas during an elevated threat if their plans don't call for that, Johnson said.

KCI is in the process of drawing up those outlines, McBride said.

"We are still doing inspection of garages and parking lots," he said, "but I do expect those parking lots will be open by Christmas."

The easement of the security rules will be a good thing, said Todd Hauptli, a spokesperson for airport operators.

"Not only do some airports lose money because they've closed parking, but they have to bus people from remote parking lots," he said. "It's definitely a passenger convenience, customer convenience issue."

Future changes

Congress has also set a Dec. 31 deadline for airports to begin screening all checked baggage for explosives with explosive trace detection equipment.

McBride said one is a wand-like system that is swiped around the outside of the bag, and the other is a cat scan that allows screeners to see the contents of the bag.

"It is a combination of the two to ensure accuracy," he said.

This multi-layering of security seems to have eased a lot of passengers' apprehensions about flying after the terrorist attacks, Russ said.

"It seems to be working," Russ said, "and I haven't heard any complaints."

Lindsay Fair, senior in psychology and electronic journalism, said the security was a lot less strict than she expected it to be when she flew to Las Vegas in November.

"I hadn't flown since Sept. 11, and I didn't know what to expect," Fair said. "It wasn't a long, drawn-out process like I thought it would be. Still, I feel confident because I don't think the screeners were any less thorough, just more efficient."

NEWSPAPERS | Program successful, could cost students $5

K-State students," Gregory said.

She said the program usually features a local, a regional and a national paper, but K-State was an exception.

Gregory gave a presentation to encourage K-State to implement the program. She said the University of Kansas has the program, and other schools in the Big 12 have the program on certain sections of their campuses.

Student Senate Chairman John O'Hara said he felt the program had many positive results. He said that if the program was implemented, it would cost students $5 per semester.

Zac Cook, student body president, said he was concerned with the accuracy of the survey's results.

"They surveyed most of the people around the points where they were distributing the papers," Cook said.

He said he thought this may have skewed results, potentially making interest appear higher than it would with a campuswide survey. However, he did think students favored the program.

"I do think there is a general support for the program," he said.

O'Hara said he was also concerned about the accuracy of the survey. He said Senate plans to do more research.

If the program is implemented, it will be in fall 2003.

BECOMING PURPLE

Transferring to K-State improved columnist's life

AMBER KOEHN

K-State holds a special place in the hearts of many, particularly mine.

So, refraining from the usual these-have-been-my-experiences-and-now-I'm-sharing-them-with-you-even-though-you-don't-have-a-clue-what-I'm-talking-about column style, I decided to take a different approach.

For my last column ever, I'd like to share with you why this university is the greatest place to be a college student.

I started my college career at a certain university down the road, you know, in that town we like to call Lawrence.

That's right – I was a Jayhawk.

And I was miserable.

I was born and bred to bleed crimson and blue, but when I ventured off to start my own life, I realized it was not what I wanted.

I had a roommate from hell (really, I'm not just making it up so you'll feel sorry for me), and all of my friends were at K-State.

My boyfriend at the time (who is now my husband) was also here, so I found myself around mid-October my freshman year commuting from Lawrence to Manhattan virtually every day.

My grades slipped considerably, and I not only gained the infamous Freshman 15, but I decided to add about five more pounds to the tally. My parents could tell I was unhappy, but they wanted so badly for me to continue my journey at KU.

All they kept saying was that I "wasn't giving KU a chance" and that I needed to "become more involved."

But, I really didn't want to spend my time at a place just because my parents wanted me to.

I was free, and I felt I was able to make decisions without their assistance.

So, when I told them I wanted to transfer to K-State, you can imagine the shock on their faces and in their voices.

No one from my family had ever attended K-State, so they fed me every excuse in the book why I should stay in Lawrence.

I tried convincing them that red and blue make purple. They didn't buy it.

But I was not deterred. I came to K-State in fall 1999, poised to turn my life around.

It worked.

I lost weight, made more friends and became involved in activities. I was finally happy.

Thinking back on my life-altering decision, there are three things that made my experience here so much different: atmosphere, accessibility and academic success.

People here are so much friendlier, courteous and helpful.

I always receive a smile or a wave from those I pass walking to class, even from people I don't know. And, I always try to return the thoughtfulness.

People at KU just walked right by like I didn't even exist.

Also, this campus is so much more accessible. The buildings are a lot closer together, and instead of taking a bus or walking a mile to campus, I can get around everywhere in relatively no time.

KU might not want to sacrifice the beauty of its campus for practicality, but K-State doesn't seem to have a problem balancing attractiveness with convenience.

Lastly, I have had more success with classes, professors and working for the Collegian than I ever would have imagined. Everything is so personable here. I just jumped right into things when I got here, and I was accepted.

My advisers and instructors couldn't have been more helpful, especially when I decided to change my major about a hundred times.

My colleagues, both at the Collegian and at K-State Research and Extension, made me feel a part of something special, and for that, I am truly grateful.

Despite the budget crises, parking problems, crowded classes and perpetual odor of cow dung, this university's pros far outweigh its cons.

And while I do miss KU basketball and Massachusetts Street, I would give it all up again to relive my three and a half years in Manhattan.

On a more personal note, I would like to extend my heartfelt appreciation to "Pitts," "Apes," "Strong One," "Fiddlesticks," "J-Bear," "Ron John" and "the man with the bright, red tennis shoes" for believing in me, helping me survive college and giving me the courage and strength to be all I could be.

I would also like to thank everyone else who positively affected my life.

I will miss you all, but I also will miss this truly great university.

Amber is a senior in print journalism. You can e-mail her at adm9559@ksu.edu.

Graduates must think of personal relationships when defining success

MICAH HAWKINSON

Our society places an enormous emphasis on getting college degrees. But why am I telling you this? You, the December graduates, probably know much more about this than I do.

Since birth, you've been bombarded with images of success. A nice home, a happy family clad in designer apparel, a few automobiles, an automatic coffee maker – these things comprise The Good Life. If you don't have all that and a bag of chips, you're a failure.

And guess what? You need a college diploma to get most of that stuff. Houses, for example, don't grow on proverbial trees. This is especially true for homes located in those really pretty neighborhoods where every freakin' mailbox is encased in enough limestone to erect a full-scale replica of the Sphinx.

To buy one of those bad boys, you've gotta have some big-time Benjamins, mis amigos. And you don't pull down that kind of lettuce without a college degree.

A house is just one of many components of achieving the American Dream. In this one commercial, I learned that no one is truly successful if he or she has not acquired at least one BMW. My friends, you cannot afford to be without such a fine horseless buggy.

Best of all, if you buy one now, dealerships might be having a sale. They seem to do that quite frequently, at any rate, so your chances are good.

Unfortunately, such excellent pieces of mechanical wizardry are not cheap, unless you choose to define "cheap" as "$30,000." You could afford one of these ingenious devices on a blue-collar salary – if you don't have a family, go naked and hungry and don't mind making payments for the rest of your natural life.

As you can see, it's nearly impossible to be truly successful without a college degree and a white-collar job. Unless, of course, you adopt a different definition of "success."

For instance, you could define it as having an enormously positive effect on others. Or you could define it as loving and doing good to all, regardless of your own desires. Or you could even define it as creating beautiful things.

All of these definitions of success make more sense to me than the one society gives us. Who in his or her right mind would make having a huge wad of stuff the ultimate goal in life? I don't think very many people would – consciously, at least.

Graduates, I urge you to combat these counterfeit values. As you receive your diplomas and cross the stage into the real world, remember the really important part of your educational experience at K-State: the people.

You've made connections with others, and many of you have changed the lives of those around them. I know that at least one of you has had an enormous effect on my life.

My friend Andy was one of my most important influences during my first couple of years here. He taught me about taking it easy and enjoying life. He made me realize that not everything has to be an enormous problem, and that it's OK to have fun while you're singing to an audience.

I won't ever forget the lessons I've learned from Andy and from others who are graduating this month. When you leave, don't forget the people who have changed your life during your stay in Manhappenin'.

Whatever you do, don't think of your diploma as a license to go out and buy the American Good Life. It's not bad to have cool stuff, but if that's your single motivation, you have some serious priority problems.

Rather than focusing on how rich you're going to get when you start working, keep in mind the important things – the people.

Remember: Your college relationships will ultimately be worth more than a million Sphinx-mailboxes.

Students earn degrees, stay in Midwest after college

By Tristan Hinderliter
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Jeff Stewart graduates this month. He had job offers in Arizona, California and Texas but decided instead to take a job closer to home in Lenexa, Kan.

He said, however, that location didn't come into play at all.

"The main reason is because I have the best job opportunity there," he said.

Stewart, senior in construction science, said he got a job with the construction company Straub, a smaller general contractor.

"Basically, I'll be working right underneath the vice president of the company. It was my best job opportunity," he said.

Although he has family in Kansas, he said that wasn't really a factor in his decision where to go after graduation either.

Stewart said he plans to live in the Kansas City area and commute every day to Lenexa, about a 17-mile drive.

He won't be the only K-State alumnus in the Kansas City area, according to data from Jeanine Lake, K-State Alumni Association director of information services.

Out of 148,605 K-State graduates and donors who live in the United States, about 51 percent live in Kansas, she said. The Kansas City area claims the most K-State graduates and donors with 14 percent.

Second on the list is Wichita, at 5 percent, then Dallas with 3 percent and Denver with about 2 percent. The majority of K-State graduates stay in the Midwest, she said.

Of last year's graduating class of 1,972 with bachelor's degrees, over half stayed in Kansas, said Kristy Morgan, assistant director of Career and Employment Services. Next highest was Missouri with 234.

That can be accounted for because of Kansas City, Morgan said.

"Kansas City is the biggest attraction," she said, "and the Dallas area is pretty hot – highly sought after."

Texas is third on the list for last year's graduates, claiming 140. It is followed by Colorado with 64 and Nebraska with 38.

Morgan said the distribution is pretty consistent year to year.

Not all graduates, however, stay in the Midwest. Elena Vossman, senior in landscape architecture, graduates in May and plans to go out of state.

"A lot of the jobs right now for my major are in Florida or California – they're pretty coastal right now – or the Southwest, basically places where it stays warm most of the year," she said.

"I would have wanted to go out of Kansas anyway," Vossman said. "I studied abroad last year. I lived in Italy, and after being in Europe and seeing so many different huge cities and so many different cultures, I'm really interested in seeing more of America and knowing more about our cities."

Eric DePriest, senior in political science, also said he wants to get out of the Midwest, but he doesn't get to make the same choices as Stewart and Vossman about where to go after graduation. The United States Air Force makes that decision for him.

Alumni Association links university, graduates

By Kari Kennedy
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

After graduating, students might move far away from K-State and lose contact with what is going on at the university.

The K-State Alumni Association is available to help graduates stay linked to the university.

"Some people move away, and it is hard to maintain contact with that school when you are so far removed," said Mitzi Frieling, associate director of alumni programs.

Most colleges within the university purchase a one-year college gift membership for recent graduates, which helps the Alumni Association keep track of members for events such as reunions, said Courtney Marshall, director of member services for the association.

If a college doesn't provide the one-year membership as a gift, a recent graduate discounted membership costs $15 per year. The Alumni Association considers a recent graduate a person who has obtained an undergraduate degree within the past five years.

Membership in the Alumni Association includes a subscription to the K-Stater magazine, a 15 percent discount at the K-State Student Union Bookstore, and discounts on green fees and apparel at Colbert Hills Golf Course.

Members of the Alumni Association also will get an annual K-State wall calendar, discount child care at home football games, discount subscription rates for the Powercat Illustrated sports magazine and Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex privileges with additional fees, according to the Alumni Association's Web site.

"It's a good deal. If you look at the cost of merchandise, playing golf and even the Rec Center, you really do utilize the benefits," Marshall said. "Even if you do move away, you still save some money."

Besides the benefits in Manhattan, there are also opportunities throughout Kansas for members.

With the 30 alumni clubs in the state, and 70 across the country, members who have moved away from Manhattan can find a club closer to home.

The clubs usually have a large event each year that gives the alumni a chance to gather and hear about K-State.

"It is a link that they have back with the university with the things they experienced as a student here," said Missy Decker-Heidrick, associate director of alumni programs.

With the Alumni Association, just because a person graduates, it doesn't mean the K-State experience is over.

"There are just lots of things you can get involved with to stay involved and keep in touch with the pulse that is going on here on campus," Decker-Heidrick said.

K-State Alumni Association

To become a member of the Alumni Association, applications can be filled out at the Alumni Center, over the phone, or online at www.k-state.com/membership.

- Alumni Association Recent Graduate Annual Membership: One year, $15; Three years, $45.
- Alumni Association Recent Graduate Life Membership: $600 one-time payment or $64 each year for the next 10 years.

"As in any small business, if you're going to make it succeed, you're going to have to work at it. Farmers are no exception."

John Schmidt | ASSISTANT PROFESSOR OF AGRONOMY

College graduates go back to farmers

By Shannon Hartenstein
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Ever since Kyle Cott can remember, he has always wanted to farm.

"It's where my passion's at," he said. "I've never had another job in my life that I wanted to do."

Cott, junior in agronomy, isn't alone. Myles Vulgamore, junior in agricultural technology management, and Brent Close, senior in agricultural economics, are just a couple of students who share the same passions.

They came to K-State with intentions of bringing new skills and education back to their family farms.

John Schmidt, assistant professor of agronomy and Cott's adviser, said several of the students he advises plan to return to the farm following graduation.

The lifestyle is part of what attracts Cott to farming.

"The part I really like about it is that the whole family is involved in the farm," he said. "You make decisions as a family and work as a family."

Close agreed.

"I really miss being on the farm while I'm at college," Close said. "That's an affirmation of my desire to farm because of the desire I have to be there while I'm at school."

Vulgamore, a fourth-generation farmer, said he's always eager to go home. He farms with his family every summer and during breaks.

"I'm usually one of the first ones to leave town because I'm eager to get back," he said. "I hate being locked up inside, and I don't like things that are repetitious. Farming gives you the opportunity to do a lot of different things. One of the appealing things is that you're your own boss."

But being the boss comes with added responsibility.

"Farming is hard work, and it takes a lot of time," Schmidt said. "As in any small business, if you're going to make it succeed, you're going to have to work at it. Farmers are no exception."

A college degree helps farmers make better management decisions, Schmidt said.

"They make much better managers," he said. "They see the management decisions for what they are, as opposed to a way of life. It's a business, and I think people have to understand that."

Schmidt said it is important that college graduates bring education back that will benefit the farm. Students can learn skills in business, technology, animal science or other classes to help strengthen their farms, he said.

Close said he's learned much outside of class, too.

"The biggest advantage I've gained from college has been meeting new people and learning about a different part of life," he said. "Going to college has given me a broader view of life – how to look at other options. I see that I still like farming the best."

But students could face challenges, Schmidt said. Some students find difficulties in making the transition from the social atmosphere of the university to having fewer peers on the farm, he said.

Students might also experience financial challenges.

"There are definitely some concerns with the situation that the farm economy is in right now," Close said. "I think my degree allows me to look ahead and run through different options as far as profit levels. Through that, I might be able to see how things might work out financially."

But Schmidt said if farms are managed well, most students can earn decent money.

"I know there's a lot of talk in the press about farmers going under, but I don't buy all that," he said. "But I'm sure there are some economic shortcomings."

Cott said he's not worried about finances.

"I know the Lord's going to provide," he said. "A lot of reason for coming to college was if I do get back to the farm and it doesn't work out, I have a degree to fall back on. So much of farming is completely out of your hands."

Vulgamore said money management will be critical.

"It's just like any business. You've got to be good at it to stay in it," Vulgamore said. "In farming, I think you need to be new and innovative and good at what you're doing. I think as long as you're doing that and not spending gobs of money elsewhere, you're going to be making money."

Despite the challenges, Close said he has always enjoyed farming.

"I think you definitely have to follow your heart," Close said. "I do believe there's a future. I'm lucky to have the option to go back and farm."

Hiring predicted to increase by 4 percent

Rogie Dorpinghaus
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

College graduate hiring is predicted to increase 4 percent in 2003, according to a survey of top entry-level employers on www.collegegrad.com.

The hiring results are only marginally better than in 2002, which was the worst year for entry-level hiring in 20 years, according to the Web site.

The results of the survey showed that large companies were predicting hiring the same number of or fewer college graduates in 2003, while small companies (under 1,000 employees) to medium companies (1,000–10,000 employees) were showing increases in graduate hiring.

Jim Ragan, economics professor, said conditions are bad for graduate students trying to get jobs in most fields.

"Right now it's taking longer to get job offers, because students are disproportionately affected by the ups and downs of the economy," Ragan said.

When a company is hiring less or cutting current positions, it is less likely to fill new positions before it will lay off people, Ragan said.

However, he said there are some good things about this economic situation.

"Some good news is that when college grads get jobs during this time, they are most likely to not get laid off. More years of education means lower unemployment rates and less likeliness to get laid off," Ragan said.

However, anytime the economy goes bad and hiring dries up, students might choose to take lower job positions and work up to the positions they want or opt to continue their education at graduate or law school, he said.

Dottie Evans, assistant director of Career and Employment Services, said students should not go to graduate school to avoid an entry-level position.

"Some people are inclined to think more education is advantageous," she said, "unless your ultimate career expectation has to have a higher degree to land the job you really want."

Ragan is confident the economy will get better and said some fields go through cycles of hiring.

"Be careful not to project the same economic situation today for three years later," he said. "Today's freshmen are more likely to have less difficulty finding jobs than seniors."

However, since it is harder to get jobs now, Oldfather had some advice to help students in their search for jobs.

"The first thing is to lower expectations – be a little less fluffy about choosing job opportunities and where you are. The more flexible you are about relocating, the more likely you are to get a job," Oldfather said.

Evans said students should make certain they do the right things to land a job. She said the two keys that will ultimately get the job no matter the student's major are strong networking and making a lot of contact with the employers.

"Once the economy gets better, if they know you, they'll remember and say, 'We know them – let's interview them.' If you've made connections, you're going to be the first person they think of, even in career fields that might be in the highest demand," she said.

Ragan said students searching for jobs should be aggressive with contacts and shouldn't take rejection personally. Instead, he said to be "thick-skinned," have good presentations skills and do homework to learn about the company.

"With the economy the way it is, the little things are more important," Ragan said. "It's going to get better, and people – over (the span of their) careers – do well with college degrees. So learn right now, and do not be discouraged, because you've got to get through the doors in a job to be able to stay."

Speakers look forward to challenge, honor of giving commencement address

By Edie Hall
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A sea of black hats and robes sway back and forth to "Pomp and Circumstance."

It's a picture more than 1,420 students will be a part of Friday and Saturday at K-State's fall commencement ceremonies.

This semester, about 1,150 bachelor's degrees, 225 master's degrees, 65 doctoral degrees and 30 associate's degrees will be awarded.

Twenty-nine students earned multiple degrees, and 75 students have earned their degrees through distance education programs.

Commencement ceremonies will kick off with K-State's Graduate School at 1 p.m., Friday in McCain Auditorium. The commencement for the College of Technology and Aviation also will be at 7 p.m. Friday at the Kansas Highway Patrol Training Center auditorium.

The remaining colleges will have their ceremonies Saturday.

Each college within K-State has selected a commencement speaker to address graduates about work, school and life in general.

Carol Kellett, dean of the College of Human Ecology, will speak to graduates in her college about reflection and anticipation.

"The focus really is on graduating into a period of time in which our world is changing very rapidly," Kellett said.

"I'll talk about looking back on their college experience, and ahead to graduate school, or a job or profession."

Kellett said she's very honored to speak to students in her college.

"I consider commencement to be one of the most important days in a person's life – one that they share with family and friends – and being a part of that ceremony and day of transition in their life is a great honor," she said.

Pat Bosco, dean of student life, will address students in the College of Engineering at their commencement.

Bosco said he'd offer graduates helpful, practical advice that will he hopes will be humorous and informative.

"It's a tremendous honor," Bosco said.

"Being asked to deliver a commencement address at KSU is one of the highest honors a faculty or administrator or student can receive. I'm humbled and will try to do a good job."

College of Education officials asked Alice Bertels, fourth grade teacher at State Street Elementary School in Topeka, to speak at the college's commencement.

"I'm going to talk about the positive aspects of being in education with details about daily highs and lows and ways you can contribute to your profession and your college," she said.

Bertels said it was important to give back to the college a person graduates from, and that she was thrilled to be asked to speak at the college from which she graduated.

"I do think it's very important to support the college that trained you," she said.

"To be asked back is such an honor – to be recognized in that way, and also to give back to the college that has done so much for me."

All commencement ceremonies will be aired on Cox Cable channel 8 during the days following graduation.

MIDWEST | Some graduates move away for lifestyle change, to pursue career goals

DePriest is an Air Force ROTC cadet and will be commissioned as a second lieutenant when he graduates in May.

He has a navigator slot, he said, so after graduation, he goes to Randolph Air Force Base in San Antonio, Texas, for training.

Upon completion of training, he gets to pick which plane he wants.

Different Air Force bases around the country have different planes, so whichever plane he chooses determines where he goes.

"I know most people choose the aircraft they want instead of the place," DePriest said.

"I'd prefer just to put down what aircraft I want, because in times like these, I'll probably be in Saudi Arabia half the time, anyway."

DePriest is originally from Derby, Kan., and he has lived there all his life, he said. However, staying in the Midwest is not on his agenda.

"If I could go anywhere, I'd go over to the East Coast – somewhere like that. I'd prefer to stay away from the Midwest, just because I want to get out and see different things," he said. "So I'd prefer to get away, but with my luck, I'll probably wind up stationed at McConnell.

"I was recently out in New York, and I just loved it out there – the scenery and everything was just great."

Although some graduates may travel far and wide, they don't forget their roots.

"I know Kansas City, and I know I can always come back to it," Vossman said. "I know my family will be there, so while I'm still young and I don't have anything tying me down, I'd like to be able to go somewhere and see what it's like."

Bubonic plague vials found

By Betsy Blaney
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

About 30 vials of the plague that were reported missing at Texas Tech University were found Wednesday in a mysterious episode that triggered a terrorism-alert plan and showed how jittery Americans are over the threat of a biological attack.

The FBI refused to say how it had accounted for the vials. However, an FBI official in Washington, speaking on condition of anonymity, said authorities believe the samples of the lethal bacteria were simply destroyed and not properly accounted for, rather than stolen or misplaced.

FBI agent Lupe Gonzalez said a criminal investigation was continuing.

The samples, about 30 of the 180 the school was using for research on the treatment of plague, were reported missing to campus police Tuesday night.

"We have accounted for all those missing vials and we have determined that there is no danger to public safety whatsoever," Gonzalez said.

Plague – along with anthrax, smallpox and a few other deadly agents – is on a watch list distributed by the government, which wants to make sure doctors and hospitals recognize a biological attack quickly.

Texas Tech said that officials thought it was "prudent" to get law enforcement involved because of current concerns about bioterrorism.

The FBI sent agents to Lubbock. The Centers for Disease Control and Prevention also took part in this investigation.

Homeland Security director Tom Ridge contacted Lubbock's mayor. About 60 investigators from the FBI and other agencies converged on the medical school Tuesday night.

A post-Sept. 11 emergency plan was activated, under which Lubbock-area hospitals and medical personnel were notified to be on the lookout for cases of plague. But the public was not told about the incident until late Wednesday morning.

Mayor Marc McDougal said the public was not notified because of information the university received late Tuesday that indicated the missing vials were not a threat to the public.

"I think when you look how quickly it came down and how it got resolved, I think it would be hard to second guess how we handled it," he said. "One thing we didn't want to do was cause people to panic."

— Associated Press Writer Curt Anderson in Washington contributed to this report.

Plague not currently stored at K-State

By April Middleton
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

After a scare at Texas Tech Wednesday involving missing vials of bubonic plague, K-State said it is prepared to safely handle, transport and store such agents.

While the plague is not presently stored on campus, one laboratory did preliminary research with the agent about a year ago. The agent has since been removed from the lab, but more could be obtained for research.

Ron Bridges, biosafety officer, said that within the last few years, many guidelines have been set forth on how to handle agents that are deemed to be sensitive from a bioterrorism perspective.

He said those guidelines cover the transfer of these select agents from one laboratory to another. In order to transfer them, laboratories must be registered with the Center for Disease Control. The CDC monitors what the agents are, who is using them and what they are being used for.

"They want to make sure that everything is legitimate and no one is being put in Manhattan Kmart will not close

Discount store expects to get out of bankruptcy by April

By April Middleton
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Manhattan's Kmart store will remain open despite the announcement of the planned closure of 326 stores nationwide.

Three Kansas stores are planned to close, though. Independence, Lawrence and Wichita each will lose a store.

The closures are part of a plan for the discount store to get out of bankruptcy by the end of April.

"We don't want to remain in bankruptcy a day longer than necessary," chief executive James Anderson said.

The discount chain will emerge from bankruptcy at least one-third smaller than it was when it went in.

Kmart filed for Chapter 11 protection from its creditors a year ago. At that time, 283 stores were closed and 22,000 jobs were cut. The discount chain still lost more than $2 billion, though.

The most recent round of proposed closings and about 30,000 layoffs have to be approved by a federal bankruptcy judge at a hearing in Chicago on January 28. The stores are scheduled to close 60 to 90 days after that time.

Patty Ranzenberger, human resources, said the stores that are closing were selected based on both financial and strategic considerations. One of those considerations was an analysis of the competition the stores would face in the area.

Arun Jain, a marketing professor at the University of Buffalo School of Management, said Kmart needs to find a way to distinguish itself from the competition.

"Wal-Mart and Target are going to rip them up," Jain said.

Linda Alexander, marketing instructor, said she doesn't think that has to be the case in Manhattan.

Although they will face stiffer competition with the opening of Super Wal-Mart and Target, Alexander said, the Manhattan community needs a variety of retail choices.

"I think Manhattan is under-stored on retailers to start out with. With the large number of college students in town, this is a prime market," she

A long line of transfer students and mid-semester freshmen snake through the first floor of the K-State Student Union. As they move their way toward the crowded ID Center, yawning students look over their stacks of forms and brochures given to them at registration.

Some have brought parents or friends along for orientation and enrollment.

Mike and Abbey Coburn, however, have brought their 6-month-old daughter.

It's 8:30 a.m. Tuesday, and they've just begun their life at K-State.

As transfer students from Wichita State University, the Coburns have decided to finish their education at K-State and are enrolling along with 300 other transfer students for the 2003 spring semester.

Emily Lehning, assistant director of New Student Services, said January enrollment and orientation bring together the enrollment process while introducing students, like the Coburns, to K-State.

Red, yellow, green and blue were just a few of the wild blend of colors for students to tie-dye with at the third-annual Welcome Back Day on Wednesday.

From 10 a.m. to 2 p.m., the Union Program Council invited students to the Union Courtyard to tie-dye shirts, create magnetic photo frames and receive a variety of free gifts ranging from a UPC events calendar to a T-shirt.

"For some reason, college students love doing crafts," said Kelly Ernst, traditions committee chairman and junior in mass communication. "It's all free."

Ernst, who has been planning the event since October, said Welcome Back Day was an opportunity to let others see all of the activities UPC has to offer, as well as to recruit new members for the council.

Ashley Friesen, junior in English and UPC member, said many people were just passing through, buying books and taking advantage of the event.

EDITOR'S LETTER

Collegian staff works to serve readers with timely reports, more coverage

DANA STRONGIN

Whether you're slumped in the back of a drafty lecture hall or sitting straight and proud in the front row of a small classroom, it's time to realize that the semester has started.

The first Collegian of the semester came out today, too. But Collegian editors and staff members started planning for these editions long before the holiday craze even started.

We know almost all of you pour over the Campus Fourum and spend classtime solving crosswords. But the editors also work hard to provide information and entertainment for readers' more specialized interests and concerns.

This spring is different from many that have passed. The nation is teetering on the brink of war with Iraq, while leaders are still trying to keep an eye on threats ranging from North Korea to al-Qaeda network leaders. Who really knows what all could happen today, this month or before finals come around?

Whether you think about it daily or not much at all, the possibility of war, terrorist attacks and other international disturbances could change your life.

Collegian editors want you to be informed so you can form opinions on what could happen to your family or the families of others. Therefore, we have already started building relationships and seeking information that will prepare this paper for war or other attack situations.

Editors are also planning ahead for other important events, such as Student Governing Association elections, budget cuts and constraints and state legislature action.

If you perused any Collegians last semester, you probably noticed its new design. Because of that new look, we've been able to add spice to the second page with celebrity and weird news, along with the ever-enlightening Banter and Bellow column.

We also provide quick bytes of news and facts in rails on the front, entertainment and sports pages. We know you readers are busy with classes, work and other responsibilities, and these rails help you get the basketball statistics or movie times you need without wasting lots of time searching.

This semester, the design will be tweaked to better fit reader needs. Staffers are working to use this design even more this semester. Dedicated editors have switched responsibilities and tackled old ones with hopes of adding zest and cleaner information to our pages.

We know fires and weapons inspections are not the only topics you like to read about. The Collegian also will have plenty to offer to readers who enjoy arts and entertainment news, as well as other feature stories. The Edge page will provide everything from music news to cooking ideas to movie reviews.

The full-page Life pages will also come out every other Wednesday starting at the end of January. This will give readers a chance to enjoy lively, more in-depth stories than the regular pages can offer.

Many readers are big fans of reading about K-State athletics, and with good reason. Both basketball teams entered the semester on positive notes, and the baseball team will be vying for a return trip to the Big 12 tournament.

This semester, the Collegian will add extensive and timely coverage of weekend sports events online, even before they reach the print version of the paper. Check out the Electronic Collegian at www.kstatecollegian.com to see how your favorite teams did during the weekends.

Whether you think about it daily or not much at all, the possibility of war, terrorist attacks and other international disturbances could change your life.

The eCollegian will have other new items for readers. There will be a section for Aggieville businesses to advertise their specials. Also, our front page and other designs will be available online.

Collegian photographers are planning special coverage, and readers should expect to see entire pages, even sections, of the excellent photographs these projects will yield.

I've talked a lot about what Collegian editors and staffers have been doing. What's important for you, the reader, to remember is that we are doing it for you. We want you, after reading our paper, to feel more informed, more educated and even entertained.

If you ever want to share comments, let us know. Send letters to the editor to letters@spub.ksu.edu, and story ideas to news@spub.ksu.edu. You can call the newsroom at (785) 532-6556, or stop by Kedzie 116, the newsroom.

Enjoy the crossword, read the comics, and even try out a news story or two. We are doing it for you.

Dana Strongin is editor in chief of the spring 2003 Kansas State Collegian. You can e-mail her at des9898@ksu.edu.

Michigan university considers using environmental model to build golf course on landfill site

Officials say sharing research with other universities builds model's credibility

By Edie Hall
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Research done at K-State could help golfers around the nation.

Western Michigan University may use K-State's environmental evaluation model, which was created during the development of Colbert Hills Golf Course and helps researchers better communicate changes occurring in an ecosystem.

Although there is no money changing hands for K-State researchers' time and knowledge on Western Michigan's project, Bob Krause, vice president of institutional advancement, said the application of the model at Western Michigan is further validation of the model's effectiveness.

He said the additional collaboration will add credibility to the model, which may put K-State in the position to put the intellectual property on the marketplace.

"If we could get it on the marketplace, it would be a tool that could be purchased by any golf course," Krause said. "If we could get the field trials high enough to establish the model's credentials on the marketplace, it would be a benefit to our program."

The model, which was created using the pristine prairie site on which Colbert Hills was developed, also will be applicable to Western Michigan's site for a new golf course, a former landfill.

"It's two ends of the spectrum," said Steve Thien, professor in agronomy and head of the K-State research team. "One is a natural system, and one is a dump.

"The model is flexible enough that it will work in both places."

Thien said researchers needed a way to easily describe many aspects of the Colbert Hills site, such as water quality, soil quality, plant ecosystems, aquatic ecosystems and insect ecosystems. He said K-State's solution to this problem was coming up with the model.

K-State's model is a process of putting environmental features, with upper and lower limits, in a graphical representation format, said Steve Starrett, associate professor of civil engineering.

The graph, which is called a composite spider radar graph, is easier to read than the numerical tables that were used previously to evaluate changes in an ecosystem.

"We've created a process – an environmental tool," Starrett said. "The software is what actually creates the graph."

Thien said that presenting the data in a graphical way enables researchers to monitor many environmental aspects at once. This helps them learn where they should spend money and time on making changes.

"We want to know how humans impact the environment and not be surprised years down the road and have to say, 'Oh, we shouldn't have done that.'."

Steve Thein
PROFESSOR IN AGRONOMY AND HEAD OF THE K-STATE RESEARCH TEAM

The new way of presenting the data also makes it easier for people who are interested in the development of a piece of land to understand the technical information in layman's terms.

Environmental evaluation makes for fewer complications and consequences in the years after a piece of land is developed, Thien said.

"We can look back in history and see places where we were surprised when a certain chemical has caused a health hazard," he said.

"We want to know how humans impact the environment and not be surprised years down the road and have to say, 'Oh, we shouldn't have done that.'"

Bob Miller, associate vice president at Western Michigan, said he and a colleague visited Colbert Hills to take a tour and learn more about K-State's model.

Miller said he has appreciated K-State researchers' help on Western Michigan's project.

"They've been absolutely wonderful in sharing everything that has been done at Colbert Hills," he said. "They've showed us how the university was involved and explained the student involvement, in addition to being a great host."

Miller said he is excited to have the opportunity to partner in an initiative that would reverse negative effects on an environment.

"We can do something good for the community," he said. "It could be a win-win situation for a variety of different constituencies. For the community, it affects compromised land, and at the same time presents potentially a wonderful research and learning opportunity for our faculty, staff and students."

OPINION

TO THE POINT

Editors explain roles of opinion page pieces

The Opinion Page is often misunderstood as the Collegian's official opinion.

There is one space of the entire newspaper that is dedicated solely to the editorial board's official opinion – that is this space. All other news and columns throughout the paper are based off of reporting or, in the case of a column, a writer's personal opinion.

To the point is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

In regards to editorial control, the Collegian is fortunate in that it is not faculty-controlled. We do, however, have one faculty member who serves as news adviser to the Collegian. This person, among other duties, critiques the paper, and helps with training and recruiting. The news adviser does not preview content before it appears in print.

All Collegian news staff positions are paid and are filled by students. Student Publications Inc. – a nonprofit organization – owns assets of the Collegian, Royal Purple and the Campus Directory.

As a separate entity from the university, the Collegian has virtually complete control of news judgment. Our goal, through our coverage of news, is to create an unbiased medium that answers one question: How does this affect K-State students?

Opinion pieces, which are always accompanied by a mug shot of the writer, reflect the opinion of that particular writer and not necessarily the views of the Collegian.

The Editorial Board, through the daily editorial "To the Point," tackles a particular issue that it feels deserves attention by students. It is through this editorial that we will express an opinion that we think will reflect the thoughts of the students. Our purpose is to be the voice of the student body. Through reader feedback, the Collegian can help in shaping the future of K-State.

WRITE TO US

The Collegian enthusiastically welcomes letters to the editor.

Oftentimes, student and faculty voices are overlooked on campus, and letters to the editor, along with the Campus Fourum, are outlets for everyone's opinions to be heard.

Letters can be hand-delivered to the newsroom by the author. Upon delivery, the author will be asked for photo identification. Letters also can be e-mailed to letters@spub.ksu.edu or mailed to Kedzie 116, c/o Paul Restivo, opinion editor.

The author's phone number and e-mail address must be included on these submissions but will not be published with the letter. They are required for the opinion editor to contact the author with any questions or comments concerning the letter.

The Collegian reserves the right to edit any letters received for publication. Letters should be no longer than 400 words. This is to ensure that as many voices as possible are heard.

Some tips for writing a letter to the editor are:

- Keep your opinions short and concise. Get straight to the point, then elaborate on your thoughts and feelings.
- Keep topics closely related to current events. This will increase your chances for publication.
- Present your view, then offer a solution or suggestion.
- Make your letters about issues, not personalities or personal vendettas.
- Try to offer as many diverse opinions as possible, but be sure to put an interesting spin on your comments.

Remember, the Collegian will not print any comments that are vulgar, obscene or libelous, so keep your letters clean.

BACK TO THE GRINDSTONE

Maintaining old habits helps in semester change

LAYTON EHMKE

My seventh grade English teacher used to say that people who needed a vacation the most were people who had just returned from one. The rationale being that it was too painful to get back into the mix after absence.

It's as if you would need a monumental moment of self-actualization on a moon base to get your mojo back. Easier said than done.

The truth is, getting back into the swing of things would be much easier if we all kept as mentally active during the break as we do in the heat of the semester.

My former teacher came from a solid Quaker rearing in Iowa. Of course, being Quaker is synonymous with having a work ethic that army ants are jealous of, and the soles of your shoes are probably made of stale hash browns.

Her idea of being a good human was to be constantly aware there is much to learn and many things to do. One of her pet peeves was seeing kids doing nothing. And kids doing nothing is truly a tragedy. Down with Nintendo!

This theory of personal productivity follows closely with a number of parables and quotes.

Here's a quote my farmer/journalist/renaissance-man father used to say: "He who chops his own firewood is warmed twice." Meaning he is first warmed by the actual fire and second, with the satisfaction of accomplishment of chopping the wood for which all who are near it will be warmed.

This is most certainly true.

While in the western Kansas' High Plains for the holiday, I for sure did my share of hard-core kickin' it. However, I did get the opportunity to actually do some serious wood choppin' and grain bin cleanin'. It wasn't like I was working off 'college fat,' it felt more like the oiling of the Tin Man's rusty hinges. Besides, I don't have any fat to work off. Look at me, damn it.

Nonetheless, I had forgotten how much satisfaction comes from getting your hands dirty and having something to show for your hours of labor. I got a taste of accomplishment, and sure enough, I was hungry for more. So instead of chopping more wood, I went hunting. Yes, I'm a killer. During break, I took the lives of a happy rabbit couple, a beautiful (and tasty) pheasant and Bambi. If you're feeling worthless, grab a hand cannon and watch the fur fly. Ahh. Superiority. Bloodworthy bliss. Squirrel meat. Excellent.

There is surely something to be said for staying active both mentally and physically. That something is a word, and the word is good.

I was also blessed with the chance to cruise a lightning quick 5 mph through a field of milo stubble for a day. I'm all about the John Deere style. I had forgotten how much could be accomplished in one day. My only hope is that this semester goes as smooth as working that field of stubble for all of you, but especially for me.

It's all about being able to actually see the progression of your work. A great way to do that is to keep good records of it. Write down your greatest accomplishments. Take a peek at that list toward the end of semester. Then, when you've had enough self worship, get lit and go bragging. Also, watch out for flying fists.

Someone else used to say something about how the idle mind is the devil's playground. As appealing as that sounds, I suggest staying out of that particular playground and use you noggin for more than just a play area altogether. Best of luck.

Affirmative Action only fuels further segregation of races

ZACH HAUSER

The stories of a society overrun with white supremacy are never allowed to be just a distant uneasy remembrance.

The bumpy jaunt down memory lane reveals and reignites tensions and angst for everyone affected who has a grasp on their heritage. We are too often needlessly reminded of a past when whites separated themselves from blacks and rose above them in some elaborate facade of superiority, power and might, while denying those with different skin, privileges and fundamental rights that make up the bedrock of American equality.

Ironically, it is now the African American that is bequeathed with the advantage and privileges while denying the same to others.

But before we delve into the turbulence, a pithy lesson on why some things are the way some things are.

President Kennedy, in 1961, established the President's Committee on Equal Employment Opportunity. This was then carried over into Lyndon Johnson's presidency, and it was Johnson who actually coined the phrase "affirmative action."

However, at this time it only applied to federal contractors. Not until the 1964 Civil Rights Act did affirmative action take on public accommodations against race and sex discrimination.

In a speech made by President Johnson in 1965, he stated, "You do not take a person who for years has been hobbled by chains and liberate him, bring him up to the line of a race and then say, 'you're free to compete with all the others,' and still justly believe that you have been completely fair.

"Thus it is not enough just to open the gates of opportunity. All our citizens must have the ability to walk through those gates ... we seek not ... just equality as a right and a theory, but equality as a fact and equality as a result."

Color isn't an issue anymore. The only injustice is the fact that people are still making it one.

Is a policy of preferential treatment toward minorities morally justified and right today?

No.

Affirmative Action was the gateway to the desegregation of the "blue and white collar" in the late 1960s. And for the time and place in which it was created, and the immediate decades which followed, it served its purpose of at least staining the starched white collar.

Time has made the integration of minorities into mainstream society an accepted fact of living in a virtual melting pot of a country with no one culture.

Affirmative Action was a necessary step in desegregation and equality for all, which is why it was packaged with the Civil Rights Act of 1964.

But this is 2003, and things have changed. We have the Internet, franchised coffee and retro clothes. But Affirmative Action is one relic of the past best put out to pasture.

Carl Cohn wrote that, "Deliberately visiting the sins of the fathers upon their innocent children and grandchildren to the special advantage of persons not connected with the original sinning is neither lawful nor morally right."

But law, our government and Starbucks have gone further and further away from their model.

Sandra Day O'Connor, the first woman on the Supreme Court, said, "racial gerrymandering, even for remedial purposes may balkanize us into competing racial factions."

Through all this folly, America has pit two beloved altruistic ideals of "equality for all" and "through hard work, you can accomplish anything" against each other and has effectively recreated the glass ceiling that the progression of civil rights and democracy has fought so hard to break.

It seems as though people are under the impression that there are still grave injustices happening.

Color isn't an issue anymore. The only injustice is the fact that people are still making it one. Blame it on the media, children being preprogrammed to see a difference, Jesse Jackson or the invention of waffle fries.

But only when we stop letting the past control the present can we truly cleanse segregation and prejudice from the minds of America and work toward a "colorblind" society.

CAMPUS FOURUM | 395-4444

Here are some tips for calling the Collegian's Campus Fourum:

Keep your opinion based on issues, not personalities or personal vendettas.

It might be helpful to write down your comments before calling. There is only time for about two or three short sentences.

The Collegian encourages as many diverse opinions as possible, so try to put an interesting spin on your comments.

Do not give too much background on the issue. Immediately state your stance or a plan of action.

Be honest. We do not ask for your name, nor do we use Caller ID to see who comments are coming from. Your opinion is completely anonymous.

The Collegian will not print any comments that are vulgar, obscene or libelous.

So it's Christmas Eve and I'm calling the Fourum 'cause I'm bored. So, Happy Christmas, Fourum.

Going clubbing. A black X on your hand. The smell of smoke in the air. The day after: a faded X on your hand and the smell of smoke in your hair.

Monday morning of finals week and a 7:30 final. Didn't answer a single question. Life is good.

I would rather have a bottle in front of me than a frontal lobotomy.

I got hit by a truck and attacked by a squirrel in the same day.

Having sex with a man doesn't make you gay. It's cuddling afterwards.

If I could turn back time. If I could find a way. I make up all the things that you said to me. And you'd stay.

Hey, this is the Kansas State Readers' Fourum, and I have a message for 'em. Get it? For 'em?

Let's hear it for our Kansas State humping puppets. Great victory over Arizona State.

Yes, I was disappointed that I didn't get good grades last semester. But, look at the bright side. At least I didn't gain 35 pounds like a freshman girl.

Hi, um, I'm calling from KU, and I was just going to tell you that our forum is way better than yours. Bye.

With a new semester arriving, it's about time for another "all your base are belong to us." All your base are belong to us!

I would like to congratulate the K-State women's basketball team for their wins during semester break. They are definitely the best show in town, and we are ready for more.

Students gain motivation to return to spring class routines

By James Hurla
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Lindsey Bauman | COLLEGIAN

Beth Whaley, junior in accounting, searches for a textbook for one of her classes in the K-State Student Union Bookstore. Many other students took advantage of their last days of winter break to prepare for a new semester.

Elizabeth Mitchell enjoyed a relatively relaxing winter break.

Visiting friends and family, along with fulfilling some of her duties as a College of Engineering ambassador helped her pass the time.

"I actually got kind of bored," Mitchell, junior in industrial engineering, said. "It was fun, but it just seemed like there should be some purpose. It will be nice to get back and do something."

But not all students returning this semester are as eager as Mitchell.

It can be difficult for students to stay motivated when entering a new semester after a long vacation, Brent Dringenberg, freshman in chemical engineering, said.

"What we do influences how we feel," Carlstrom said.

Students should jump into the semester, devoting time to school work and studying, although they might not have anything due for a month, he said.

"At the same time, it's important to respect the ebb and flow and rhythms of the semester," Carlstrom said.

Throughout the semester, mid-terms and finals probably will be more stressful times and require more effort on the part of each student, he said.

However, Carlstrom said it should not be expected for students to maintain this high devotion to school work from the beginning of the semester.

Maintaining a balance between personal time and time devoted to school is important in living a healthy lifestyle, he said. Exercise, time for friends, and personal time all should be budgeted.

"Students get out of the routine of going to class every day," he said. "You can't expect the motivation to be right there, so you have to get going even though there are no immediate deadlines."

Some students, however, might not need Carlstrom's advice.

Contrary to many students, Mitchell said she feels refreshed after her break from school.

"It was a pretty short break," she said. "And I'm ready to get back to work."

New restaurant to offer varied menu

Whiskey Creek Steakhouse to replace former restaurant near mall

By Jessica Packard
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A new steakhouse is coming to town and bringing a lot of variety with it.

Jim Gardner, CEO and president of Whiskey Creek Steakhouse, said students make Manhattan a great market for Whiskey Creek.

As a result, the steakhouse chain will be opening a restaurant near Manhattan Town Center on Feb. 10.

The restaurant will be located at 200 Manhattan Town Center, using the former Country Kitchen restaurant building.

"Whiskey Creek is renovating the interior and exterior of the building so it will not look anything like the old building," said Lyle Butler, president of the Manhattan Chamber of Commerce.

Whiskey Creek offers a range of menu items but it is most famous for its grilled steaks that are cooked over a hardwood fire, giving it a different taste compared to the traditional mesquite style, Gardner said.

"The flavor profile of our food is unique," Gardner said. "It's totally different than what you're used to."

Whiskey Creek also includes a full-service bar that offers 57 different styles of margaritas.

Gardner said the restaurant's design benefits all types of customers.

Part of the restaurant includes the bar with a smoking section while the other portion of the restaurant is a non-smoking area and a meeting room.

With a new restaurant in town, Butler said a new full-service restaurant creates several advantages including employment opportunities and variation in the food outlet available for area residents.

In addition, he said that Whiskey Creek will add variety to the food venue without hurting other local restaurants.

He said it might even bring more business to other restaurants close to the Whiskey Creek such as Chili's, Carlos O'Kellys and Applebee's Grill and Bar.

"Restaurants grouped together do very well," Butler said. "It's going to enhance and add to the good food venue in the community."

However, local restaurants feel that the opening of Whiskey Creek will somewhat affect business.

"It's going to affect every other restaurant here probably for the first couple months," said Lawrence Streckfus, assistant manager for Amarillo Mesquite Grill. "We're not too worried about losing business."

"We know that after everyone has tried the new restaurant, our regulars will return and business will go back to normal," Streckfus said.

Andrea Bannister, manager for Applebee's, said she believes the new restaurant will increase business for other area restaurants located by the mall.

"These added businesses will help keep people here in Manhattan rather than traveling to Topeka for food and shopping," Bannister said.

Gardner said there would be employment opportunities for Manhattan residents with the new restaurant opening.

Management will hire more than 100 employees to fill several different staff positions in mid-January. Persons interested in applying for a position with Whiskey Creek are directed to got to www.whiskeycreek.com and apply online.

"These restaurants are a fun place of work and still very professional," Gardner said.

Cats survive ISU to extend streak to 11

By Dan Smith
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Women's college basketball has struggled for two seasons to produce someone that matches sharpshooter Laurie Koehn's potency from behind the 3-point arc.

On Wednesday night against Iowa State, Chelsea Domenico did her best to play the part.

The sophomore guard tied career highs for points, 14, and 3-pointers, 4, as the Wildcats (16-1, 3-0) squeaked past the Cyclones (6-8, 1-2) 68-60 at Bramlage Coliseum to extend their winning streak to 11 games.

From the tip, it was evident the contest wouldn't be a cakewalk.

After Kendra Wecker dropped a short jumper to start the game, K-State missed its next seven shots, while the Cyclones raced to a quick 10-2 lead.

But down 11-4 after the first media timeout, Coach Deb Patterson turned to what her team knows best – the 3-pointer.

The Cats' next 18 points would come via the long-range shot, including nine from Domenico's hot hand.

"Certain people stepped up at certain times and that's what it's going to take to keep winning games," Domenico said.

Domenico, in particular, stepped up to fill the absence left by Laurie Koehn, hobbled during her 26 minutes with a foot injury.

Iowa State would score just five points on 2-of-5 shooting during the Cats' 3-point barrage, as K-State built a 22-16 lead. The margin would grow to as many as 11 before the

Wecker's seventh double double powers K-State past 6-8 Cyclones

By Ben Fehr
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Kendra Wecker took her second Big 12 Player of the Week award onto the court Wednesday night against Iowa State.

She brought six double-doubles to the floor as well.

The sophomore wasted no time in displaying some of that ability by scoring the game's first points with a quick jumper in the lane.

But things didn't go so smoothly from there.

Wecker missed her next four shots as Iowa State ran out to a 10-2 lead.

Wecker said her early problems came from too much urgency.

"We were just rushing some shots," Wecker said. "I know, myself personally, I was just trying to force too much the first few minutes of the game."

But K-State used three straight 3-pointers, including one from Wecker, to even things up at 16 at the 11:22 mark.

When the halftime buzzer sounded, the Wildcats had a 36-26 lead, and Wecker had 11 points and six rebounds.

The sophomore forward would add seven more points in a second half that saw Iowa State pull within one point four times.

With 2:07 left, Wecker earned her seventh double-double with a defensive rebound that preserved a three-point Wildcat lead.

With 20 seconds to go, and with K-State clinging to a four-point lead, Wecker stole both the ball and Iowa State's hopes of an upset.

Iowa State head coach Bill Fennelly said Wecker does some things in reality that don't show up on tape.

"She's a great athlete and is physically strong," Fennelly said. "But the thing that amazes me about her – watching her in person, something you don't see on tape – is that her body control is tremendous.

"She can jump, and it looks like she's moving, sliding, and whatever in the air. That's not possible."

Fennelly added that

Women's schedule won't get any easier with conference games

After beating up on Iowa State last night, Nicole Ohlde paused to pry a bug from her teeth.

In a scene reminiscent of Jim Carrey and Jeff Daniels in "Dumb and Dumber," Chelsea Domenico and Kendra Wecker did, too.

It seems leading the Big 12 pack comes with some unexpected dietary side effects these days.

However, the Wildcat women seem willing to supplement their menus in exchange for more wins.

The road will get tougher for K-State, though, as the team moves further into the conference schedule.

A look at some of the Wildcats' biggest second-half challenges tells the tale:

Jan. 25 vs Texas

The Cats' first Big 12 test will come from the Longhorns. Luckily, it will also be at Bramlage Coliseum.

Last season in Austin, Jody Conradt's squad took a first-place
K-State team to two overtimes before falling 80-76.

This year's meeting could have a similar storyline. K-State is likely to enter the contest undefeated in conference play and atop the Big 12 standings.

Texas is 9-4, but the Longhorns' 2-0 league record is evidence that Conradt's troops will come to Manhattan ready to play.

UT has beaten Oklahoma State and Missouri by an average of 22 points this season, and the Horns could be flying high if they manage an upset of Texas Tech on Jan. 22 in Austin.

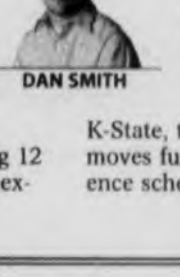
Second Wildcat leaves men's team this season

By Sean Purcell
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Even when a team is hot, there's always someone unhappy.



For K-State, that someone was senior Janerio Spurlock.

The 6-foot-6-inch forward has quit the team due to dissatisfaction with playing time, Coach Jim Wooldridge announced Tuesday.

"I was worth more than what I was getting," Spurlock told the Collegian on Tuesday. "I felt that I should have been playing something, even if it was five or six minutes."

Spurlock averaged three points, 0.7 rebounds and 7.3 minutes in 10 games this season. But not since the Dec. 11 game against Texas-Pan American had Spurlock been on the court for more than five minutes.

"There are only so many minutes to go around, and it is our goal to distribute those minutes in the best interest of the team," Wooldridge said in a statement released Tuesday night.

Spurlock

Spurlock played in seven games, starting three, for the Wildcats last season before a fractured right patella ended his season.

Spurlock said he wanted to prove his ability to rebound from that injury this season.

"Whatever it was I could have given the team, I would have," he said. "I wanted to prove to people I could come back from injury, but I could have rebounded, scored, or done whatever was necessary to help the team."

Spurlock said he plans to stay at K-State and finish his degree in sociology. He becomes the second player this season to leave Wooldridge's squad, after sophomore forward Marcelo Da Barrosa left on Jan. 10 to pursue academic interests in Brazil.

Spurlock's departure could mean more playing time for a host of Wildcat reserves. Putnam City, Okla., freshman Marques Hayden has been K-State's top reserve, averaging 7.6 points, 5 rebounds and 19.8 minutes per contest off the bench.

Cats drop conference road game

Over at eight games

The Collegian takes another look at K-State's longest winning streak since 1997-98.

- K-State 102, UTPA 68
  K-State shoots 61 percent, and six Cats finish in double digits
- K-State 79, Wichita State 66
  Frank Richards tallies 20 points and seven assists, and the Cats hit eight of 12 3-pointers.
- K-State 88, Lipscomb 64
  K-State's defense holds the Bisons to 37-percent FG shooting.
- K-State 90, Oregan State 72
  Gilson DeJesus has 21 points and 10 rebounds, and K-State sets a new mark for consecutive wins under Jim Wooldridge.
- K-State 73, Monmouth 64
  Tim Ellis scores 21 off the bench and Pervis Pasco hits 9 of 9 from the floor.
- K-State 65, Saint Louis 48
  Pasco nets 16 points and grabs 10 boards, and DeJesus adds 14 points.
- K-State 71, Central Florida 59
  K-State makes its first six shots and leads by as many as 15 in the first half.

Michel Morandais scored 25 points, including five points in the final 3:13, and Colorado snapped K-State's eight-game winning streak, 69-63 on Wednesday night.

The Buffaloes (11-4, 1-1) got 12 points from Blair Wilson – all in the second half – and 11 from Stephane Pelle.

K-State (10-5, 1-1) was led by Tim Ellis' 14 points. Matt Siebrandt added 12, and Pervis Pasco had nine points and 14 rebounds.

Colorado, bouncing back from Saturday's 69-54 loss to Oklahoma, went up 42-34 on Morandais' dunk on an alley-oop pass from Pelle early in the second half.

K-State cut the deficit to four points, but Morandais hit a 13-foot jumper, Wilson a 3-pointer and Antoine McGee a driving layup for a 52-41 lead with 10:37 remaining. Moments later, Wilson's two free throws gave Colorado its biggest lead, 57-44.

Siebrandt had four baskets in a 9-0 run that made it 57-53.

Wilson then hit a 3-pointer with 4:18 left, and Morandais followed with a short jumper and a 3-pointer for a 65-54 lead with 1:16 left.

A pair of 3-point baskets by Gilson DeJesus in the final 27 seconds made the score respectable.

K-State's comeback hopes were hurt by poor free-throw shooting (3-of-12) in the second half.

Colorado center David Harrison played only 24 minutes, fouling out with 2:55 left after scoring seven points.

Morandais scored 14 points in the first half as Colorado took a seven-point halftime lead.

Morandais' second of three 3-pointers in the half gave Colorado an early 13-6 advantage.

Siebrandt's driving layup helped the Wildcats reduce the deficit to four points at 19-15, but Morandais followed with a three-point play and McGee with a 3-pointer for a 25-15 lead.

Ellis had a three-point play and a 3-point basket to make it 33-31 with 2:23 remaining.

Pelle, on a feed from McGee, scored a fastbreak layup and was fouled, making the free throw, with 1:10 to go. Morandais beat the buzzer with a 15-foot jumper, putting Colorado ahead 38-31 at intermission.

NFL | Mariucci canned as Niners' coach

Steve Mariucci was fired as coach of the San Francisco 49ers on Wednesday.

Mariucci jockeyed unsuccessfully for a contract extension last season, despite a 57-39 record with the team and four playoff appearances. The team was knocked out of this postseason last weekend with a 31-6 loss at Tampa Bay.

NFL | Redskins' Edwards promoted

The Washington Redskins will make linebackers coach George Edwards their fifth defensive coordinator in as many years.

Edwards replaces Marvin Lewis, who became the new coach of the Cincinnati Bengals on Tuesday.

Coach Steve Spurrier confirmed Edwards' promotion late Tuesday to reporters in Mobile, Ala., where he is scouting practices for the Senior Bowl. Spurrier had long hinted that Edwards would be his choice if Lewis left, and several players had lobbied publicly for Edwards because they didn't want to learn yet another new defensive system.

Bartolo Colon went to the Chicago White Sox in a three-team deal that included the Yankees and provided New York with the fringe benefit of keeping Colon away from the Red Sox on Wednesday.

In the three-way swap, the Yankees sent pitcher Orlando Hernandez and $2 million to Chicago for reliever Antonio Osuna and minor leaguer Delvis Lantigua. Then the White Sox packaged Hernandez with right-handed pitcher Rocky Biddle, outfielder Jeff Liefer and cash to Montreal for Colon and minor leaguer Jorge Nunez.

"It is quite possible that I will never play top-level tennis again, because my feet don't allow it," the 22-year-old Hingis told the Swiss news agency Sport Information in an interview published Wednesday.

High School | James' vehicle OK

High school basketball phenom LeBron James' mother is cooperating with state officials investigating whether James accepted a sports utility vehicle as a gift.

Gloria James has spoken to Ohio High School Athletic Association commissioner Clair Muscaro and provided documentation about the vehicle, OHSAA spokesman Bob Goldring said.

On Monday, the OHSAA began an inquiry to determine how James acquired a 2003 Hummer H2. State officials were concerned that James, a senior, might have violated a state bylaw that says an athlete forfeits his or her amateur status by "capitalizing on athletic fame by receiving money or gifts of monetary value."

K-State adds to growing tradition of successful bowl games

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

SAN DIEGO – Finally, K-State football has its closure.

Toward the end of the 2002 campaign, Coach Bill Snyder was asked repeatedly to comment on his team's performance.

And repeatedly Snyder told the media he would reserve issuing statements and congratulations until after the 25th Pacific Life Holiday Bowl.

So when the Wildcats capped off a fourth-quarter comeback to defeat Arizona State 34-27 on Dec. 27 at Qualcomm Stadium, Snyder kept his promise and reflected on the way K-State finished its season.

"Take away the first two quarters, and this is the best one, yeah," he said.

Although the win was closer than many predicted, it gave K-State six straight wins to finish out 2002.

With the win, the Wildcats also became the first college football program to record 11 wins in five of six seasons.

Snyder said that's what made the win even more enjoyable.

"It really is a special achievement for these young people, but also for those who have built the foundation, going back as far as 1989, 1990," Snyder said. "It is very special to do something for the first time in history. It's worth note, and I am proud of the people who had something to do with it."

Snyder also had to be proud of the way the Cats fought back after entering halftime down 20-14 to a team oddsmakers picked as an 18-point underdog.

"When we were coming in at halftime, we had a lot of people talking about the first half," senior cornerback Terence Newman said.

"I was like, if we're going to win this game, we need to forget the first half and concentrate on the second half. Everybody in the locker room thought we could win this game – offense, defense and special teams.

"We just kept chipping away and did what we've been doing all season."

Matt Stamey | COLLEGIAN

James Terry hauls in a catch for a first down during the first quarter of K-State's 34-27 victory in the Pacific Life Holiday Bowl. Terry finished the season with 28 catches for 561 yards and five touchdowns.

The 24-year history of the bowl suggested no lead was safe. Fifteen contests had been decided by a touchdown or less.

In fact, the Wildcats had faced a similar situation nearly three years before. The Washington Huskies held a 13-10 halftime lead on K-State in the 1999 Holiday Bowl, but the Cats would rally in the fourth quarter behind quarterback Jonathan Beasley to record a 24-20 win.

This time, the faces were different, but the situation was similar. K-State needed a touchdown late, and its quarterback was the one to get it for them.

Ell Roberson, mediocre for three-plus quarters, showed up when he needed to. The junior completed both passes he attempted on the Cats' final drive for 25 yards, and added 24 yards on the ground. The drive lasted seven plays and covered 59 yards.

After the game, Snyder said Roberson couldn't have been better when it counted.

"Ell would probably be the first to tell you he has had some better ball games, but when it was all on the line, I think he was very special," Snyder said. "He not only did some tremendously talented things physically, but he did some excellent mental things as well that led to giving us the opportunity to succeed."

K-State had clutch performances from its other big-name players down the stretch as well.

Sophomore running back Darren Sproles rushed for 118 yards to extend his school record for 100-yard rushing games to 10.

Junior linebacker Josh Buhl had four tackles, running his season total to 135, good enough to tie for 11th on the Cats' all-time list.

K-State's chances for another successful run in 2003 look good, with Roberson, Sproles, Buhl and nine other starters returning next season.

"I am very excited," Roberson said. "We have some guys coming back and hopefully we'll get some good recruits, and we'll try to get it next year."

Winter Break Recap:

- Offensive coordinator Ron Hudson has called his last play at K-State. Hudson, an eight-year fixture with the Cats, accepted a position on the Kentucky staff earlier this month. Offensive line coach Paul Dunn also will join Hudson on new Kentucky coach Rich Brooks' staff. K-State reloaded with coaches of its own, naming Del Miller and Greg Peterson co-offensive coordinators. Bob Stanley, who served as a graduate assistant in 2000 and 2001, will replace Dunn as the team's offensive line coach.

- Junior linebacker Terry Pierce has declared himself eligible for the 2003 NFL draft. Pierce finished 2002 with 110 tackles, second to Josh Buhl's 135, and five sacks, second to Andrew Shull's 10.

K-State cornerback bows out as one of Wildcats' best ever

Kelly Glasscock | COLLEGIAN

Terence Newman carries the ball during the Pacific Life Holiday Bowl Dec. 27 in San Diego.

Newman takes his leave on a positive note after Holiday Bowl

By Sean Purcell
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

SAN DIEGO – Terence Newman's effort against Missouri was so good that K-State asked him to give an encore performance during the Holiday Bowl.

He provided that, and then some.

The senior cornerback closed out his collegiate career not only by limiting the production of Arizona State's top receiver, Shaun McDonald, not only by returning punt and kickoffs, but also by playing more offense than he had the entire season.

To no surprise, Coach Bill Snyder said it was all by design.

"I wanted to, and I think Terence wanted to as well," Snyder said about using Newman on offense. "I think Terence would have been tremendously upset with me and, considering the fact that he will make so much money, I want to stay on his good side, I want to see that he played a lot.

"But in my mind, I wanted him on the field as much as I could get him on the field."

However, Newman's impact on offense wasn't made until K-State needed to get things going.

Down 10-0 in the second quarter, quarterback Ell Roberson hooked up with Newman for 36 yards. The completion put the Wildcats into Sun Devil territory for the first time, and the crowd was brought to its feet as Newman provided the spark.

K-State would score the next play.

"Terence is a tremendous player and it's been great playing with him," defensive tackle Tank Reese said.

"He goes out and does things that you know everyone can't do. He's one of those players that wants to do better, wants to work hard every play, and its been great playing with him this season."

Newman wasn't done, though.

Nearing the end of the third quarter, K-State needed a score. The Wildcats again turned to their star.

First, K-State tried Newman on the ground, a trick play that Arizona State thwarted for a three-yard loss.

So the Wildcats went back to the air, this time for 15 yards on a crucial third down. K-State would later score to tie the game, but Newman's day still wasn't finished.

Tied at 27 late in the fourth, K-State's defense held, forcing the Sun Devils to punt.

Newman dropped back, awaiting the punt.

Twenty-seven yards later, the ball was spotted in Arizona State territory and, despite a holding penalty that negated 10 of those yards, K-State was poised to finish what it came to San Diego to do – win the Holiday Bowl.

After the game, Snyder had a chance to put into perspective exactly what Newman meant to the program – not only in the Cats' 11th win of the season, but also during the Salina native's five years in purple and white.

"Terence is probably the best player we've had at Kansas State since I have been here," Snyder said.

Newman's career will continue as a projected top-10 pick in the 2003 NFL draft.

The best player from a top 10 team, Newman should be a valuable commodity to whichever team elects to take him.

Many scouts have said the multi-faceted player has peaked, talent-wise.

Hardly, Newman says.

"When I came into this program, they instilled in me that you can always get better. Through the seasons, this program shows that, and the players that have come through here have shown that you can always get better," he said. "So I know I can still get better."

Good-bye Newman

Senior cornerback Terence Newman's during K-State's 34-27 win over Arizona State in the Pacific Life Holiday Bowl show why the game was one of his best.

- Three receptions, 47 yards (three of his four for the season)
- Two rushes, 26 yards
- Four punt returns, 30 yards (including a 27-yarder that set up K-State's game-winning drive)
- Three kick-off returns, 46 yards
- 10 tackles

DVD extras offer audience more

Alternate endings, deleted scenes, add to DVDs' worth

SCOT GAMMILL

Within the past few years you may have noticed that DVDs are taking over the shelves at video stores. DVDs are becoming very popular because of the different options they offer, especially bonus material.

It is difficult for me to come up with the top 10 DVDs with the best bonus material because I haven't seen every DVD. Some different DVD options include deleted scenes, screen size selection, alternate endings and cast biographies.

10. "Almost Famous" is a great movie about a teenager who travels around the United States with bands and writes articles about them for Rolling Stone. This DVD offers a great amount of material aside from the movie. There is more than 30 minutes of never-before-seen footage, the making of the movie, photo galleries, biographies, original Rolling Stone magazine articles and additional materials.

9. "American Beauty" has more than three hours of bonus features, including original movie trailers, cast and crew interviews, commentaries and even storyboard presentations of the movie. It also has DVD-ROM options so you can find even more material on your computer.

8. A DVD for the guys is the recently released "National Lampoon's Van Wilder" two-disc set, which has a special unrated version. When selecting the unrated exclusive on the corner of the screen, the woman on the menu takes off her shirt. I know the ladies out there probably don't appreciate this, but like I said, it's just an option. Despite the beautiful nude woman on the menu screen, this DVD offers many other features, like music from the movie, trailers, and TV specials.

7. I'm going to include two DVDs in the No. 7 spot – the "American Pie" and "American Pie 2" collection pack. The two-disc set offers both movies plus a lot of extra material, including the making of both movies, soundtracks, deleted scenes, outtakes, classic quotes and even a "Don't Do This At Home" warning from the film's star, Jason Biggs.

6. "The Patriot" is, once again, another great movie that offers tons of great bonus material. Everything from commentaries, deleted scenes and a feature called the "Art of War" that offers a look at the movie's battlefield can all be found on this DVD.

5. "Gladiator" offers a behind-the-scenes look at the movie, storyboards and concept art, interviews, television spots, essays from the cast and crew, and the making of the movie, along with much more material.

4. "The Godfather" collection not only includes all three movies but also a fifth disc with just bonus materials. This disc has the making of all three films, cast rehearsals, interactive menu and features, photo galleries, Corleone family tree and the historical timeline of the "Godfather" movies. It would take hours to get through all the material that these DVDs offer.

3. "Snatch" is a two-disc set that gives a great behind-the-scenes making of the movie. Along with that, there are many deleted scenes, TV spots, trailers and even a video photo gallery.

2. "Se7en" was one of the first DVDs to come out with bonus material, and it set the standard for what a DVD should offer. There are several deleted scenes and outtakes, access to the film's scripts, behind-the-scenes footage, alternate endings, production drawings, alternate angles to scenes from the film and an electronic press kit.

1. Now it's time for the No. 1 DVD. With this four-disc set offering so much additional footage, many deleted scenes, an art gallery with commentaries, a map of the movie, a tour of the wardrobe department, early reels of the film, creations of the characters, book adoption, movie story boards, and so much more, the No. 1 spot goes to "Lord of the Rings: Fellowship of the Ring Special Edition."

This DVD offers so much for its audience, it was hard for me to not give it the No. 1 spot.

How They Stack Up

High DVD sales may cause extinction for VHS tapes

By Tony Herrman
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Are videocassette recorders doomed to be completely replaced by DVD players?

Or will they become cultural nostalgia, like vinyl albums?

Sales and rentals of DVDs have been increasing steadily during the past couple of years, said Adam Athavichitchanyarkas, guest service manager at Hastings Book, Music & Video.

"The forthcoming trend is that DVDs clearly outsell VHS," Athavichitchanyarkas said of Hastings' business. "We sell more DVDs at a ratio of about 5-to-1."

Athavichitchanyarkas, who owns both a VCR and a DVD player, said he had not purchased a VHS tape in the two years since he bought his DVD player.

However, Athavichitchanyarkas said he believed VHS and VCRs never will be totally replaced.

"I think in the next five years DVDs will completely take over the market, but like Beta, VHS will never be obsolete," he said.

Athavichitchanyarkas said VCRs still have an advantage over DVD players because they are more affordable than DVD players that are able to record.

"The DVD media will last much longer. The downside is if you like taping stuff because a VCR is much cheaper than a recordable DVD player," he said.

Sears, Roebuck and Co. has two models of recordable DVD players for sale for $499.88 and $799.88, whereas the store's most expensive VCR is only $119.88.

"It matters what people want," Sears' sales associate Dan Murphy said. "People who want to preserve their home movies by converting them to DVD buy these DVD players. Otherwise, most people stick with VHS."

Chris Pierce, sophomore in construction science and management, owns both a VCR and DVD player. Pierce said he hasn't rented or bought a VHS cassette in more than a year and uses the DVD player for 90 percent of his movie viewing.

"With VCRs, sometimes you have to mess with the tracking. With DVDs, you get a much better picture," Pierce said.

Bryce Haverkamp, sophomore in marketing, said he never has purchased a VHS cassette in his life, but has been purchasing DVDs since he received a DVD player for Christmas in 2001.

"Now that I'm off in college, watching DVDs is a way to keep myself entertained," he said.

Haverkamp said he thought DVDs will completely replace VHS cassettes.

"Yeah probably, especially with the way it's gone in the past couple of years," Haverkamp said. "When (DVDs) first came out, there was only a select few. Now, you hardly see VHS. It's all DVDs."

'Joe Millionaire' leads a watershed week for reality television

Last week's results proved that reality shows have become a powerful new genre.

"Joe Millionaire" was most impressive in reality-show ratings. The cruel parody — in which eligible women woo a construction worker who they mistakenly believe is a millionaire — drew 18.6 million viewers to its premiere.

ACT Testing Center new to campus

Representatives say center will assist university, local community

By Stephani Edington
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State has a new addition to its efforts in continuing adult education.

Holton Hall has opened an ACT Center – American College Test Center.

"ACT made the contact, and it took about a year for development," said Mike Lynch, associate vice president for educational and personal development programs. "We are on schedule for where we planned to be."

Led by Kim Bowker, assistant director of education and personal development, the ACT Center's main purpose is to assist individuals in developing new skills or upgrading existing ones.

The third to open in Kansas, the ACT Center is one of 150 nationwide. ACT hopes to open 50 to 100 more centers in the United States.

The other two centers in Kansas are at Hutchinson Community College and Johnson County Community College.

"We have talked to other ACT Centers since some have been operating a good deal longer than we have," Lynch said.

There are seven main categories of study, each branching into more specific courses, which include Work Keys Program, computer basics, information technology, English as a second language, industrial tech/safety skills, management/leadership and personal development.

With a continuously growing course list of more than 3,000 possibilities, the center has something to offer just about everyone, Lynch said.

"I think that's one of the more positive aspects," he said. "There's a wide range of vendors because it allows the student to go in and pick a course that's tailored to their needs. The number of courses can be overwhelming at first, so ACT has helped by categorizing them into seven specific areas."

Contact Information
- www.ksu.edu/actcenter
- ksactctr@k-state.edu

The cost of the online registration ranges from $30 to more than $1,000.

"The prices are quite reasonable with comparisons to other software of that depth," Lynch said. "Almost always, courses offered by ACT are more economical than those purchased on an open market."

After registration, participants receive a PIN and are free to complete the course at their convenience from any computer with Internet access that meets the specified requirements, in as little or as much time as is needed.

"The objective for the student is to provide them an opportunity to pick up a specific skill or knowledge that may not have been available to them in their course of study or degree program," Lynch said.

However, the program is available to anyone – not just students.

In addition to working with individuals seeking skills, the center also helps employers by working with their employees to improve their skills through an online registration.

Although not all of the courses are available online, about 85 percent are up and running.

Testing is done 8 a.m. to 5 p.m. Monday through Saturday with the exception of Saturday, when testing ends at 1:30 p.m. When students wish to test, they make an appointment with ACT.

All tests have a time limit, and the computer automatically ends the test when time is up. The test is then immediately graded by the computer, and the score is printed for the student to see.

"One of the bonuses of testing is the immediate score report that's generated," said Rita Roberts, coordinator of testing programs. "Students get immediate feedback from their experience."

Those involved with the center don't see it only as a learning tool – they also see it as a way to connect K-State with the rest of the community, Roberts said.

"People who have never been to K-State's campus are afforded the opportunity of seeing what a great and vital campus we have," Roberts said.

US formally asks for NATO help in Iraq

By Paul Ames
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

BRUSSELS, Belgium – The United States formally asked for NATO limited help Wednesday in case of war with Iraq.

NATO officials said ambassadors from the other 18 alliance nations discussed proposals based on those presented to the allies informally last month by Deputy Defense Secretary Paul Wolfowitz.

Proposals include protecting Turkey from the threat of a counter-strike from the Iraqis.

Another idea is to use NATO's planning facilities to coordinate efforts such as air or sea transport for troops and equipment, air-to-air refueling, or even air cover to ground troops.

Another proposal was using collective forces such as AWACS surveillance planes, minesweepers or naval patrol ships.

They also discussed providing troops to enforce peace and help rebuild Iraq after Saddam Hussein's regime has been toppled.

Rep. Doug Bereuter, the Nebraska Republican who heads NATO's Parliamentary Assembly, said the United States would also be seeking base and overflight rights from its allies.

NATO is not expected to play a front-line role in any possible military strike, although the United States wants individual allies to join a coalition against the Iraqi leader.

In Washington, Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld was asked if participation meant a combat role.

"There are countries that have indicated they want to participate individually in ways that I think would be characterized as combat," Rumsfeld told reporters without naming the countries.

NATO's most prominent role could be in defending Turkey, Iraq's northern neighbor, where the United States is inspecting runways and harbors in preparation for the possible dispatch of 80,000 soldiers for an Iraq operation.

"Turkey's a member of NATO, and if there's a conflict in that part of the world, that's an appropriate issue for them to address," Rumsfeld said.

Although opinion polls show more than 80 percent of Turks oppose military strikes against Iraq and the government fears war could destabilize the entire region, analysts say Turkey is likely to concede at least some use of its facilities to the United States.

On the overall U.S. request, diplomats stressed the issue was still at an early stage and no immediate decisions were expected to send the proposals to NATO's military planners.

On a visit to Brussels, Bereuter stressed a possible peacekeeping role for NATO after Saddam is toppled.

"It's potentially possible that NATO would have a role in peace enforcement, perhaps even governance" until a new Iraqi administration is able to run the country, he told reporters.

SCHEDULE | Women's season conference games prove challenging place from K-State on Feb. 13, then beat the Wildcats again in the Big 12 Tournament semifinals en route to a dream season that resulted in an NCAA Championship game appearance.

This year, the Sooners have less fire power with Stacey Dales and Rosalind Ross lost to the WNBA, but Caton Hill and Dionnah Jackson return as legitimate threats.

Feb. 8 at Baylor

After Oklahoma, K-State should get a reprieve when the Cats take on lowly Missouri at Bramlage.

But a trip to Waco to take on the Baylor Bears comes next.

The Bears could be the league's sleeper.

Baylor is 1-1 in the Big 12 so far, but the loss came to Texas Tech, the league's second-best team. Overall, the Bears are 12-2.

March 1 at Colorado

K-State shut down then-No. 24 Colorado during a Jan. 11 win.

The Cats held the Buffs to 17-percent shooting and just 15 points in the first half, both school records.

For payback, CU throttled Nebraska 74-54 three days later.

March 5 at Texas Tech

Women's basketball fans couldn't ask for a better finish.

If everything works out, K-State and Texas Tech should both be undefeated in league play when the two meet in Lubbock to end the regular season.

Tech's Planette Pierson and Jia Perkins have been the definition of consistency this season, and LaToya Davis is a candidate for the Big 12's Rookie of the Year award.

The Wildcats earned their first win over the Red Raiders since 1997 last year in Manhattan. This time, the game looks to be a much tougher contest.

STREAK | Women's 68-60 victory over ISU takes win total up to 11

Wildcats took a 36-26 lead into halftime.

After the break, the Cyclones drew to within four on a Lindsay Wilson jumper at the 13:54 mark.

The difference was rebounding. K-State held a 23-14 first-half edge on the boards, but the teams split the second half tally at 17 apiece.

"We just wanted to come out a little bit more aggressive, especially on the rebounding end," Iowa State forward Anne O'Neil said. "They had 10 offensive rebounds in the first half, and that's too many."

This time, K-State's answer was Nicole Ohlde.

The sophomore had just two points at the intermission, but Ohlde posted 11 of the team's first 14 points in the second frame to extend the Cats' advantage to six at the 10:33 mark and finish with a game-high 20 points.

"A lot of times in the first half I was rushing my shot and I wasn't really going very strong to the basket," Ohlde said. "In the second half, I got some good passes from the guards and tried to attack more and have that aggressive mentality."

After Iowa State's Anne O'Neil missed a 3-pointer, sophomore Megan Mahoney connected on a trey from the left wing on K-State's next possession to give the Cats' their largest lead of the second half at 53-44.

The Cyclones used a 12-4 run to pull within a point with 4:25 to go, but four turnovers due to a stingy Cat defense doomed Iowa State's chances for a comeback down the stretch.

"At the end of the game, when it really got down to it, we picked up our defense and they didn't get the good shots off that they had before that," Wecker said.

Leading 61-60, K-State's defense held the Cyclone offense scoreless over the final 3:31, while the Wildcats made seven of eight free throws to seal the win.

WECKER | Sophomore earns 2nd Big 12 Player of the Week award

Wecker's understanding of the game is what makes her so dangerous.

"She's got great hands," he said. "And it's one thing to be a talented athlete. It's another thing to be a talented athlete who's a good basketball player and who has a sense for the game.

Coach Deb Patterson said it was Wecker's power that impressed on Wednesday.

"I really liked Kendra's game tonight," Patterson said. "She faced a lot of significant challenges to her ability to play with intensity and power.

"When you play a team like Iowa State, if you're a player like Kendra Wecker, I think it's very important that you bring the power dimension to the floor for your team. I thought she did a tremendous job of doing that."

Wecker's power game showed up impressively with 11 rebounds. K-State's next best rebounding effort came from Megan Mahoney, with six.

Wecker's effort on the glass helped to give the Wildcats a nine-rebound edge over the Cyclones – one Iowa State senior point guard Lindsey Wilson said was crucial.

"Rebounding – that's a huge part of starting our offense," she said. "When you don't do that, it makes it easier for the other team."

Fennelly added that Wecker's contributions didn't end with rebounding.

"She is as advertised," he said. "Without question."

facilitating times to meet with their advisers and enrolling in the classes they need," Lehning said.

As first-time parents, the Coburns said they are expecting a challenge.

"The hardest part is going o be juggling her and making sure one of us is always home to watch her," Mike said, motioning to his daughter, Lila. "We have to find classes offered at the times when we need them, but opposite times from each other."

However, Abbey said they are used to balancing busy schedules.

"This will be our first semester back to school with a baby, but it should be no different than juggling two full-time jobs and trying to complete school," she said.

After attending high school in Topeka, the Coburns went to Allen County Community College, where Mike received a full-time academic scholarship. The couple married in June 1999, and transferred to Wichita State where Mike attended school part time and worked full time as a service manager at Terminix, a pest control company. Abbey was a full-time student, working part time at the university's financial aid office.

"I decided to quit my job and do something," Mike said. "I want an ag-business degree, so at first we moved to Tulsa to be near Abbey's parents and go to school at OSU, but they wouldn't give us in-state tuition, so we came here."

Mike, junior in agribusiness, said the K-State atmosphere is different than Wichita State.

"It's kind of different being the only one with a baby," he said. "When we came here, people looked at us like 'What are you doing with a baby?'"

Abbey, junior in accounting, agreed.

"At WSU, it isn't uncommon to see strollers on campus," she said. "There are a lot of returning adults there, and they have more flexible schedules because of that."

Although Abbey said it was more difficult to coordinate schedules at K-State, she and Mike already have planned out their weekly routine.

"Mike will go to class on opposite days that I will go to class," she said. "We split up the household chores, so that shouldn't be a problem, and we plan to get part-time jobs on weekends or evenings at different times as well."

Both Abbey and Mike plan on graduating at the same time, in December 2004 or May 2005.

Mike said that having a baby has delayed their plans for completing a college education, but at age 26, he didn't want to be 30 and just beginning a family.

"Four months ago I had a good job and owned my own home – now, nothing – but it will be worth it in the long run.

"We're on the 10-year program for graduation," he said jokingly while nodding to his daughter. "She has expanded our program, but she's worth it."

PLAGUE | Agents stored on campus kept safe

harm's way," Bridges said.

Only one laboratory at K-State has been registered to store and handle such agents.

Bridges said another safety precaution the university takes with such agents is taking an inventory of all labs to find out what agents they have and their purpose.

Bridges said the university is in compliance with the new select agent rule, and he is aware of what is being stored on campus.

"Steps are taken to make sure that laboratories and agents stored there are safe," he said.

"Someone always knows what's going on with these agents that are deemed sensitive in nature."

Jerry Jaax, associate vice provost, said it is important for people to keep the threat of such agents in perspective, though.

The agents that are stored, he said, generally require manipulation using serious technology to make them a bioterroristic threat.

"It's not that surprising that these agents are in laboratories, because they are not inherently in themselves real dangerous," Jaax said. "It's not like you or I would be able to go get these vials and do something malicious with them."

said.

"I think the community will be able to take advantage of more competition."

Alexander said she has heard that many Kmart stores are slated to undergo a facelift within the next five years including a new logo, new colors, changed store layouts and more intense store branding.

Ranzenberger said no other closings are planned at this time.

"The store closings represents an important milestone as we prepare for fast-tract reorganization and emerge from Chapter 11," Ranzenberger said.

WELCOME | Event greets students with shirts spring semester begins.

"It's all fun, free stuff – so why not come out?" Hilary Hilton, freshman in open-option, said. "I was dying to see people, and it was a great chance to get involved and back into the game of things."

Before participating in the event, students were asked to fill out a survey about the various events and services offered to the K-State student body.

"The survey is designed to help us better, UPC – to get ideas on what the student population looks for from UPC," Friesen said.

After completing the survey, students received free gifts, including a free T-shirt that could be twisted and tied with rubber bands before passing through a variety of dyes.

The shirts, which Friesen said proved to be one of the more popular activities, were then placed into a plastic with a container of Ivory soap to take home and wash.

"You can never have too many T-shirts," Hilton said.

Inspectors find warheads

Iraqi storage area houses 11 empty chemical weapons

By Hamza Hendawi
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

BAGHDAD, Iraq – U.N. inspectors found 11 empty chemical warheads in "excellent" condition at an ammunition storage area in southern Iraq on Thursday, and the components were not reported in Iraq's declaration meant to account for all banned weapons, a U.N. spokesman said.

Iraq insisted the warheads had been included in its declaration. It was not immediately clear if discovery constituted a "material breach" of the U.N. resolution requiring Iraq to itemize all its weapons of mass destruction and their components.

White House spokesman Scott McClellan said the administration was "aware of the reports and we look forward to receiving information from the inspectors." McClellan would not comment on how significant the find was.

The 122 mm shells were found when inspectors searched bunkers built in the late 1990s at the Ukhaider Ammunition Storage Area, about 75 miles south of Baghdad, said Hiro Ueki, the spokesman for U.N. weapons inspectors in Baghdad, in a statement.

The team examined one of the warheads with X-ray equipment and took away samples for chemical testing, Ueki said.

While the artillery rockets are evidence of an Iraqi weapons program, they may not amount to a "smoking gun" unless some sort of chemical agent is also detected, said U.S. officials, speaking on condition of anonymity.

Key questions with the new find are whether any chemical weapons were ever loaded into these warheads, and, if so, when, officials said.

Serial numbers on the rockets should tell inspectors where and when they were made, one defense official said.

State prepares to meet Bush's smallpox plan

By Crystal Becker
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Health care workers and military personnel across the state will soon receive smallpox vaccines in response to President Bush's National Smallpox Vaccination Plan announced Dec. 13, 2002.

Kansas' plan, described as a precautionary measure to protect citizens against possible smallpox exposure, is divided into three phases and will begin by vaccinating those who would respond first to a smallpox outbreak.

"Phase 1 focuses on high-risk health-care workers and local and state health department workers who volunteer to receive the vaccine," said Sharon Watson, public information director at the Kansas Department of Health and Environment. "We don't know the exact date we will receive the vaccination supplies yet, but the indication is somewhere around Jan. 27, with vaccinations beginning sometime mid-February."

According to Kansas Department of Health and Environment reports, the second phase of vaccinations will include additional volunteer health-care workers and emergency responders, including firefighters, police officers and

Attention drawn to side effects

Health officials say smallpox vaccine not for everyone

By Crystal Becker
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Since President Bush announced plans for a new smallpox vaccination program, attention is once again on the side effects of the smallpox vaccine, vaccinia.

Routine smallpox vaccination in the United States stopped in 1972, after the disease was eradicated in the country, and in 1977 worldwide. Now that health-care and health department workers may start receiving the vaccine as soon as February, the Kansas Department of Health and Environment is educating employees on the side effects.

What is the smallpox vaccine?

It is made from vaccinia, a live virus related to smallpox. The vaccine does not contain the smallpox virus and therefore may not cause smallpox.

It is the best protection available if exposed to the smallpox virus.

It provides three to five years of immunity, preventing infection in 95 percent of those vaccinated.

Because it's a live virus, it can spread to other parts of the body. Therefore, special

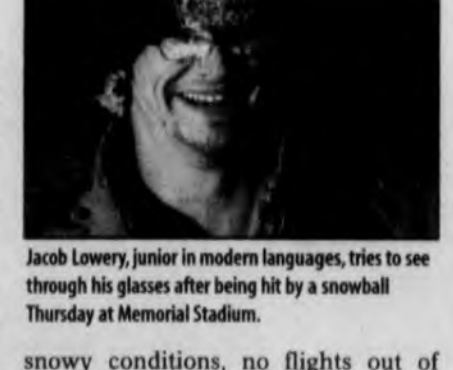
1st winter storm causes inconveniences



By Crystal Becker
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

As students were returning from break and settling into their residences Wednesday, the first winter storm of the season swept the area, blanketing Manhattan streets with freezing drizzle and three inches of snow.

Mary Knapp, state climatologist at K-State's department of research and extension, said Manhattan was lucky.

"The biggest snow total was 11 inches in Centralia," Knapp said. "Topeka received 4-5 inches and Lawrence had 5 inches on the ground this morning. The further south and west you go, the snow totals dropped considerably."

Russ Johnson, Manhattan Municipal Airport director, said that despite snowy conditions, no flights out of Manhattan were canceled.

"Since we only received three inches, there was little inconvenience," Johnson said. "We started to clear the runways at about 10 p.m. taking about six hours. Depending on the snowfall and if winds are high, it can sometimes take up to 12 hours to clear."

Director of Public Works Chuck Williams said crews began to clear the streets as soon as precipitation began, about 5 p.m.

"We had all of our equipment ready and prepared to go," Williams said. "It came at an opportune time for us because we hadn't sent crews home yet, but you never want a storm to start when everyone is headed home from work."

Williams said two crews of ten workers and nine plow trucks worked throughout the night, until 10 a.m.

State address elicits response, spares higher education

By April Middleton
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Kansas Governor Kathleen Sebelius' budget proposal backs up her campaign promise – to spare education from further cuts.

And university officials and state elected officials seem pleased with the continued support.

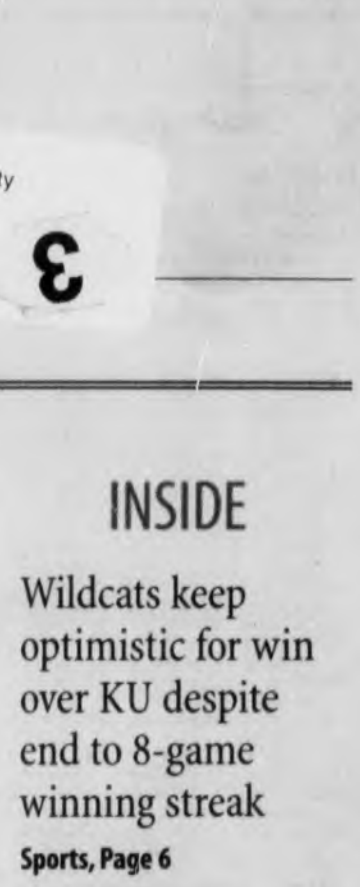
Although the state is facing a fiscal nightmare, the democratic governor, who was inaugurated Monday, vowed in her State of the State address Wednesday night that education would not be cut.

Sebelius
GOVERNOR

"As I promised throughout the last year, I will not cut education funding, even in these difficult financial times," Sebelius said in her prepared address.

Kindergarten through 12th grade education would continue to receive $3,863 per pupil in fiscal year 2004. The proposal also maintains higher education funding at the current level.

President Jon Wefald said in a prepared statement that he was pleased with Sebelius' budget proposal.



"We are very pleased that Governor Kathleen Sebelius values education, including higher education, and the vital role it plays in shaping the future of our state," Wefald said. "Her FY 2004 budget protects education, with no further reductions for this year."

Another aspect of the governor's proposed budget that would directly affect the university is a 1.5 percent raise for state workers. Faculty, unclassified professionals and

Washington community to install oversized lava lamp onto street

By Chuck Shepherd
UNIVERSAL PRESS SYNDICATE

In November, the city council of Soap Lake, Wash., a 1,700-population town that once had a booming tourist business in the 1950s but has fallen on hard times, voted the first step toward a revitalization that it believes will draw visitors back: a 60-foot-tall Lava lamp on Main Street. The architect of the campaign, Brent Blake, said, "I just for some reason thought of a lava lamp."

Upscale pet hotels are open in New York, Hollywood and (based on a December Washington Post report) Fairfax County, Va., where the Olde Towne Pet Resort charges up to $230 a day for pooches' use of a hydrotherapy pool, state-of-the-art exercise room, beauty parlor and suites with satellite TV, classical music and original, color-pleasing artwork (even though dogs are basically color-blind). Products and services elsewhere on the pet-care market include gourmet food, heated dog beds, acupuncture and chiropractic treatments, herbal flea collars, water bowls with purifiers, and, according to a December Reuters dispatch from Tokyo, therapeutic mud packs for dogs, using mud from the Dead Sea.

A federal judge in Washington, D.C., ruled in November that the U.S. Department of Justice has for about 20 years blatantly denied attorneys overtime pay in violation of federal law, a practice the department defended merely by arguing that it thought there ought to have been an exception in the law (which is an argument the department usually scoffs at when filing its own lawsuits against lawbreakers). Court of Claims Judge Robert Hodges Jr. said the department years ago simply declared itself immune from overtime-pay law for attorneys and has been maintaining two sets of time sheets (one for pay, one to track work on cases).

Readers' choice

Taiwanese national Shuo Shan Wang, 29, pleaded guilty in December in Oak Park, Mich., to practicing surgery without a license, specifically the kitchen-table castration of a 48-year-old man who had found Wang's "service" on the Internet. Wang told police he had 50 such surgeries under his belt, but that this patient began to bleed uncontrollably after bursting out laughing while eating a post-operative piece of pie at Wang's house. Police recovered two testicles in a Tupperware container in Wang's refrigerator.

Bright ideas

In November, incoming Colombian defense minister Marta Lucia Ramirez rescinded the military's policy of encouraging the country's Marxist rebels to defect by airdropping sexy photos implying that the depicted women were waiting for them upon their surrender. Said Ramirez, "I, as a woman, add myself to (the protests of this policy)." The FARC rebels, mostly men, are not allowed to have sex without permission of their commanders.

Animals being animals

Among the performers at the International Professional Rodeo Association's show at the Hardeeville (S.C.) Speedway in October: Tim Lepard and his sheep-herding dogs, which is not so novel, in that dogs are bred to herd sheep in some countries, but Lepard's three dogs are ridden during the herding by small, screaming monkeys. "I wanted to put an act together that people will always remember," Lepard said.

In November, the Longchi Scenic Area in southwestern China, apparently bowing to public pressure, canceled plans to put to sleep the five monkeys that had been terrorizing the park's visitors. According to the Commercial Daily newspaper in Chengdu, the park had become so exasperated by the marauding monkeys that it had been planning on a formal execution by firing squad. The park decided instead on faraway exile.

People different from us

Air Force Academy cadet Matt Bayless of Topeka, was expelled in April for honor code violations. Among the charges was that Bayless had lied to his colleagues about the reason he kept certain jars in his room, which, it was finally revealed, was so he could urinate in them at night without having to walk down the hall to the bathroom. In December, the academy demoted Bayless to the enlisted ranks for three years.

Least competent people

The Merced (Calif.) Sun-Star reported on Dec. 10 that an unnamed man was taken to a hospital in Modesto, Calif., after his head was split open by a brick. Police, called to the scene, were expecting to find foul play, but witnesses said the man was merely trying to see how high up he could throw a brick, and since it was dark (2:30 a.m.), the man lost track of the brick's flight and could not get out of the way when it came down on his head. Police said alcohol appeared to be involved.

Recurring themes

A November 2002 News of the Weird item reported that a U.S. Immigration official whose "visa express" program might have made it easier for some of the Sept. 11 terrorists to enter the United States, received a $15,000 "outstanding performance" bonus for his work including Sept. 11. In December, FBI official Marion "Spike" Bowman received an FBI "exceptional performance" award (and five-figure cash bonus) for his work that included Sept. 11; Bowman is in charge of the headquarters office that whistleblower Colleen Rowley blamed for impeding the Minneapolis FBI office's pre-Sept. 11 investigation of so-called "20th terrorist" Zacarias Moussaoui.

First things first

Springfield, Mass., firefighter John S. Marrero, 25, was fired in October, and superiors said it had nothing to do with the charges of possession of crack cocaine and Oxycontin filed against him. Rather, he was fired because he was caught smoking a cigarette when the state trooper arrested him, and cigarette-smoking, on or off the job, is a violation of state law for any firefighter or police officer hired since 1988. (A Plymouth, Mass., police officer was fired for the same reason in 1993, and a court upheld the firing.)

Residence halls meet students' needs by providing location, convenience

By Tristan Hinderliter
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Evan Semón | COLLEGIAN
Melanie Glascock, left, sophomore in interior architecture, and Jessica Hemberger, sophomore in interior architecture, walk to their rooms after visiting with a friend who lives on their floor. The two live in an "academic cluster," which groups students of similar majors on the same floors of the residence halls.

Melanie Glascock dragged herself out of bed at 7:30 a.m. to make her 8:05 a.m. class. She had classes all morning and afternoon until 3:30. Finally returning to her residence hall room, she layed down for a nap.

No sooner was she asleep then she was awakened to "Beep! Beep! Beep!" – her neighbor's alarm clock. However, her neighbor wasn't in her room, and the door was locked.

Glascock's plans for a nap that afternoon were foiled by a not-uncommon occurrence, but she said that overall she still enjoys living in Goodnow Hall. Location and convenience are two things that make the residence halls attractive, she said.

"You're close by your classes, and you don't have to cook," Glascock, sophomore in interior architecture, said. "It's really convenient. And also, all of my friends decided to stay here. None of us moved out, and that's just because when we're in the dorms, our parents are paying for it."

Jessica Hemberger, who also lives on the fourth floor of Goodnow, said she likes the residence hall, too. Hemberger, sophomore in architecture, said it's nice to be close to her friends.

Fourth-floor Goodnow is an academic cluster floor for architecture students, Glascock said. The women said everyone on the floor is really close.They watch movies together and just hang out, they said.

Glascock and Hemberger said they eat dinner at Kramer Dining Center with their friends at 6 every evening.

"That's the set time and everybody meets there and nobody changes that," Hemberger said. "We always have a really good time at dinner."

However, neither spoke highly of Kramer food.

"I liked it the first year," Glascock said. "But now it all tastes the same. You go home, you're like, 'Wow, there's spices – it has flavor.'"

When she doesn't eat at the dining center, Glascock said she eats ramen noodles and is trying out TV dinners. Although there are cooking facilities in the basement, both women said it was too much hassle to haul down the supplies and cook.

One aspect of living in the residence halls is having a resident assistant to help students out with any problems they might have and make sure they comply with hall rules.

"The RAs are OK," Glascock said. "They're kind of nutty. They work hard to try to build up floor unity and make sure nobody's left behind. They really encourage people to socialize more and leave their door open."

Goodnow fourth floor resident Emily Marvine, senior in music education, said she loves the social aspect of the residence hall.

"I've thought about moving off campus, but I just can't see myself not living among this many people, because I just love being able to walk next door and visit with people, and I love eating with a big group of people. I just love having people around – that's definitely the best part."

New restaurant adds diversity to Union

Greek restaurant proves popular with patrons

By Stephani Edington
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Lindsey Bauman | COLLEGIAN
Elizabeth Tollefson of K-State Student Union Food Services takes an order from Florence Sperman, chemical engineering staff member, at the Greek Odyssey Cafe. Sperman decided to stop at the new restaurant, located in the food court, because she said she thought it looked wonderful.

The Greek Odyssey Cafe, the newest addition to the Union Food Court, will be serving traditional Greek food from gyros to Greek salads to baklava.

"It's more old world than, say, going to McDonald's," said Thaddaeus Smith, chef corporate of Kronos Products Inc., the company that brought Greek Odyssey to K-State.

Eric Braun, director of dining services, said the K-State Student Union decided to add the restaurant because Greek food has been highly requested on college campuses nationwide, and it wanted to fulfill the mission of any student union – to add diversity and ethnicity to its surroundings.

"We are delighted to bring this to the students," Braun said. "In addition to Noble Roman's Pizza and Vienna Beef, Kronos is our third attempt to bring diversity to the students' eating experience."

And the addition may open people's eyes to other parts of the world, said Jason McGraw, associate director and executive chef at the Union.

"A lot of students haven't really seen a lot of the world," he said. "We want this to be a learning experience in and of itself."

The menu prospects include gyros, souvlaki, baba ganouj, spanakopita, hummus, fillo dough, tzatziki, tahini and baklava.

In addition to the base menu, there will be a four-week rotating menu, which may include different salads and varieties of pita sandwiches, but gyros will always be the main feature item on the menu.

"When most people think of Greek food, they think of the gyro," Braun said.

The food is not good; it is intended to be healthy, McGraw said.

"There's not a whole lot of fats in Greek food," he said. "The ingredient with the most fat is olive oil, and not much is used."

Greek food usually calls for more fresh vegetables than meat, including romaine lettuce, olives, tomatoes, red onions, red peppers, cucumbers, eggplant, zucchini and squash.

This is an advantage for vegetarians, McGraw said.

About 75 people on Wednesday and more than 100 on Thursday visited the Greek Odyssey during lunchtime.

Several customers said Thursday that they were satisfied overall with their choices.

"I've been to Greece before. The gyros over there are different than they are here," Bryan Aziere, senior in construction science, said. "I liked it, though."

Ned Gatewood, associate university architect, said he chose the Greek Odyssey for lunch because he wanted to compare the food he enjoys preparing himself to that of the restaurant.

"The pita bread was good, though. And the service was excellent," Gatewood said.

The Union also is planning to add a new cinnamon roll eatery, Cinnamon Street, which will appear in about three weeks, Braun said. Students can try large or small cinnamon rolls.

"It's going to be a really great addition for the students," Braun said. "You'll be able to bundle your cinnamon roll with your Starbucks' coffee."

TO THE POINT

Higher education priority in State of State address

Kathleen Sebelius' State of the State address Wednesday assured that her upcoming budget proposal will secure the most vital state funding and provide a sound financial groundwork for the future.

In discussing the state outlook for fiscal year 2004, Sebelius looks to be making good on her promises to protect higher education from further cuts. Along with safeguarding Kansas universities, current per-pupil K-12 funding also would go untouched under her plan.

With her claims of continued dedication to education spending, the newly sworn-in Governor pledged that the budget proposal, expected in February, would shift financial burdens from embattered state offices to Kansas' 10-year transportation program and local governments.

Although nothing discussed by Sebelius during the address is assured until a formal budget is proposed, the sentiments given during her speech are signs that Sebelius is committed to ensuring her proposals make their way through the Kansas Legislature.

If these early indications come to fruition, Kansas education may be on the road to financial recovery.

To the point is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

BREAKING FAITH WITH AMERICA

Bush's religious-based initiative in violation of 1st Amendment rights

ANDREW LAWSON

Less than a month into a new year, there is already a war brewing.

I'm not talking about the conflict with Iraq, though this situation is also brewing because of President Bush's hard-headedness.

It is a war of words, of ideas, of misguided and misplaced fervor.

With the support of a Republican-majority Congress, Bush will attempt to pass aspects of his presidential policy that were shot down last year.

Foremost among these is his highly controversial faith-based initiative.

Bush wants to give federal tax dollars to charitable organizations to provide services like rehabilitation and sheltering the homeless, services currently provided by the government and private, nonreligious groups.

The catch is that Bush's charitable organizations are religious – churches, mosques, temples, synagogues and more.

His plan is morally commendable, at least when taken at face value, but it comes with many disturbing drawbacks. For these reasons, America should oppose Bush's faith-based initiative.

The most dangerous implication is that this proposal will undermine the separation between church and state, violating the establishment clause of the First Amendment. Taxpayers will be forced to contribute to religious organizations, as if the government were prodding them with a collection plate. As far as historical precedent, President James Madison, who drafted much of the Constitution, vetoed a similar bill in 1811.

Another problem is that these religious groups, which use federal funding, are not subject to federal employment or disability regulations. They can refuse to hire homosexuals or discriminate on basis of religion, and they do not have to accommodate handicapped people.

Currently, some religious groups receive federal money, but there are strict stipulations on how they can use it. The most important is that they cannot press their faith on people who come to them for federally funded services. Bush's plan would sweep those restrictions aside, forcing the needy to choose between hunger and proselytization.

The problems don't just affect Americans. The religious groups themselves would undoubtedly be subject to government bureaucracy and regulation. Federal funding would reduce people's incentive to donate or volunteer. Various religions and groups will be competing for grants, which is just asking for conflict.

Even if the previous legal issues are set aside, Bush has shown that he will probably exercise personal biases in distributing the money. He has already denied the Nation of Islam funding because he feels they preach hate. Will other non-Christian religions feel the same pinch?

The most ridiculous aspect of this policy is that there is no reason for Bush to be pushing it. The current system works well enough, so why change it? Worse yet, there is almost no research to prove religious groups will provide better services than the government or private entities on a wide scale, according to The New York Times.

Many groups oppose the faith-based initiative, including the NAACP and the American Civil Liberties Union. The most significant critics, though, are the clergy of America. More than a thousand priests, rabbis, ministers and other religious leaders have signed a petition asking Bush to abandon this course of action. Bush's own Methodist denomination has condemned his plan.

The Rev. Barry W. Lynn, executive director of Americans United for Separation of Church and State, said it best: "The president should give up on this unconstitutional, unnecessary and unworkable scheme. This plan forces taxpayers to support religion, it could force religion on families in need, and it threatens the independence of our houses of worship."

Maybe if Bush had actually listened to such constructive criticism last year, special-interest groups wouldn't need to wage a war to get his attention.

With a new semester, would the Natural Disasters girl still be considered Natural Disasters girl even though she's not in Natural Disasters anymore?

Thanks for kicking me out, K-State.

OK, I'm back from break and the first thing my roommate does is pull out a drill and start drilling things. Should I be scared?

Yeah, I'm really glad that that stupid Anime cartoon is gone, but what happened to Paul White, man? He was like my hero. What, did the Republicans steal him away in the middle of the night? Put Paul White back!

People in Manhattan, Kansas live in a bubble.

There's a difference between clubs and bars. Silverado's: bar. Longhorns: bar. Bobby T's: bar. Anything in Kansas City: club. Anything outside of Kansas: club. Be warned.

We are making the movie "E.T. the Extra-Testicle," about a guy with three testicles. Ahh, what a good movie!

Best piece of advice I could ever give is to get your tubes tied.

If we are all God's children, why is Jesus so special?

The guy that made the snow angel after the girls' basketball game last night is awesome.

Two airballs in a row? Oh my god, Pasco. Oh my god.

Holiday represents vision of Dr. King

ANGEL WILSON

Martin Luther King Jr. Day, which is Swahili for "no classes," is Monday.

For some, it is another day that is greatly appreciated in a semester when the breaks are few and far between. For others, it is very much a "day on and not a day off." But what exactly does this mean, and why the hell should anyone who isn't black care in the first place?

You should care because King was a revolutionary. Not simply the man who laid the groundwork for the Southern Christian Leadership Conference (SCLC) or an exemplary leader in the civil rights movement. He was a revolutionary because he had a vision.

Vision is what makes people like Rosa Parks refuse to move from their seat. Vision makes husbands, wives, friends and family cling to a leader's every word. Vision makes people believe when there seems to be no hope left.

What made King's vision so unique is that the people guided it. He may have had the fancy title, but he was merely a vessel for the people's movement.

So why the holiday? According to a 1985 article in the Seattle Times, "King is the only American besides George Washington to have a national holiday designated for his birthday."

Internationally, King is one of the few social leaders of any country to be honored with a holiday. Such status held by a member of a country's racial minority is almost non-existent. Generally, the honor is reserved for military or religious figures.

President Ronald Reagan signed the holiday into legislation in November 1983. Numerous individuals, including Rep. John Conyers, a Michigan democrat who submitted legislation to commemorate King's birthday had heavily lobbied it for 15 years.

The Seattle Times article later revealed "petitions carrying more than 6 million signatures – said to be the largest petition drive in history – were submitted to Congress in 1970."

Because of the many trials and tribulations continuously faced by so many people in the world, the King holiday is far from just a day off. Because he took such a noble stand and consistently upheld his beliefs in the face of adversity, many of us publicly revere him. Because of the amount of work, time and energy, in addition to the blood, sweat and tears of many, his dream is faithfully remembered.

It is also because of the astonishing and wondrous vision of King that the men of Alpha Phi Alpha fraternity Inc. invite us to their annual memorial walk and candlelight vigil. The walk begins promptly at 6 p.m. from the Catholic Student Center, ARCK and Derby Complex parking lot. From there, we will proceed to All Faiths Chapel for the vigil.

Although it would be nice to have a day where you sleep in, go catch "Lord of the Rings: the Two Towers" for the fifth time or snuggle up with your boo, it would also be nice if you took the initiative to step outside the box. Volunteer at an organization or attend a program or event of another culture. Read a book that conflicts with your current beliefs or values.

So if King were alive today, what do you think he'd wish for? I don't know the answer, but I'd bet it'd have something to do with following yet another vision.

TO THE EDITOR

Hauser's column one-sided, disrespectful to minorities

Editor,

This is in response to the opinion article published Thursday titled "Affirmative Action only fuels further segregation of races." I am not entirely surprised that a young, white male living in the Midwest would espouse to these beliefs. I find Hauser's remarks to be unfounded, biased, unsupported, and disrespectful.

Affirmative Action programs do not benefit just African-Americans. They benefit all minority groups. Hauser focuses attention on African Americans. I encourage him to rethink Affirmative Action as it relates to his mother or his future wife and daughters.

Affirmative Action was not considered until 1964, which is less than 40 years ago.

Slavery lasted more than 300 years, with full protection under the law not being in place until 30 years ago. African-Americans have lived in this country for more than 400 years and have had equal protection for 30 years.

Hauser said, "We are needlessly reminded of a past when whites separated themselves from blacks..." My first issue is the phrase "needless." It would be great if we could only acknowledge the rosy parts of American history, but we don't have that option.

Our country has condoned and turned the other cheek to the gross mistreatment of many groups of people. Is Hauser feeling guilty? Or is he ashamed of what happened? We as a country have a long history of human rights violations, segregation, discrimination, and many other "black marks" in our history. We cannot go forward as a nation until we face these facts.

Hauser also creates a picture in which whites removed themselves to some oasis from which to look down upon the rest of society. He needs to realize that what happened was not a removal of whites from society. It was the attempted expulsion of non-whites. Not only that but in many states non-whites were subject to beatings, lynchings, etc.

All deemed illegal at the time but the legal system of the United States turned a blind eye and a deaf ear to what was happening. Only in the last decade has the murder of little girls killed in a bombing of a church in Birmingham been sent to trial.

I disagree that the Internet, franchised coffee, and retro clothing are the cures for social ills. Time heals nothing. Only a frank and honest look at history, and a complete assumption of responsibility on the part of the guilty parties, of what has taken place, heals wounds.

The most upsetting comment is that "color isn't an issue." Ever hear of a man named Trent Lott? And there is still that issue of racial profiling. The Collegian should be the voice of all K-State students, not the privileged few that are on staff.

Bush plan causes concern

By James Hurla
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A Supreme Court ruling against the University of Michigan's admissions policy would not affect K-State's policy, but President Bush's attack of the policy has reignited the debate over affirmative action.

Bush announced Wednesday that his administration would file a brief with the Supreme Court arguing that the University of Michigan's use of affirmative action in its admissions standards is unconstitutional.

"I would tend to agree it would be a step in the wrong direction," said Clyde Howard, director of affirmative action at K-State.

K-State does not consider race in its admissions policy, director of admissions Lawrence Moeder said.

Instead, K-State uses qualified admissions, which admits students based on ACT scores, class rank, or completion of a core curriculum set by the Board of Regents.

This policy is similar to Texas' admission standards, which were enacted in 1997 when Bush was governor.

"Race-neutral admissions policies," Bush said Wednesday, "have resulted in levels of minority attendance for incoming students that are close to, and in some instances slightly surpass, those under the old race-based approach."

The University of Michigan uses a point system for admission to its law school. Out of 150 possible points, 20 are awarded to minorities, 20 if a student gets a recommendation from the provost, 12 for a perfect SAT score, 10 for attending an elite high school and four for being the child of an alumnus.

Bush said that this system creates an unfair advantage and may keep some better-qualified applicants out.

But Howard said the advantage helps in making everyone's chances equal.

"Some people fail to take into account that it's not an even playing field," Howard said. "It doesn't take into account present and past discrimination."

But giving minorities special favor in admissions takes away the equality that the Civil Rights Movement gained, Stephanie Wing, senior in mass communications, said.

"We're almost taking a step backward if we rely on race to determine admission into law school," Wing said.

However, Doug Benson, associate professor of modern languages and adviser for the Hispanic American Leadership Organization, said Bush's decision to speak out against the university's policy takes into account only academics, and excludes other parts of higher education's mission.

"One of the most important things about a university is having access to each other," Benson said.

"In the real world, you're going to work with people on a regular basis, and you need to have experience working with all kinds of people."

Walk to celebrate Martin Luther King Jr.

By Lindsey Tipling
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Martin Luther King Jr. came to K-State in January 1968 and spoke of his dream. Don Fallon, K-State coordinator of religious activities, had lunch that day with King, just four months before his assassination.

Fallon said King's overwhelming presence was the most memorable thing about him.

"I remember he was relatively short and really very young," he said. "Yet he carried a very intense look in his face and in his eyes."

Fallon will be speaking at the Martin Luther King Memorial Walk and Candlelight Vigil along with the Rev. W. Bartalett Finney, who will be the main speaker.

The memorial walk starts at 6 p.m. Monday and is sponsored by Alpha Phi Alpha fraternity, Paris Rossiter, the fraternity's secretary, said.

The walk is an annual event for which students start from three different places and then walk to the K-State Student Union, said Orion Carrington, president of Alpha Phi Alpha.

The three meeting places will be Derby Dining Center, Kramer Dining Center and St. Isadore Catholic Student Center.

"It will be a silent march mimicking what Dr. King did in Washington, D.C.," Carrington said.

The march will then proceed to All Faiths Chapel for a candlelight vigil service at 7 p.m., Carrington said.

Carrington said the members of Alpha Phi Alpha have numerous reasons for wanting to pay their respects to King.

"Dr. King was one of our frat brothers," he said. "He made so many contributions as a civil rights leader."

The fraternity also will be sponsoring a fund-raiser called A Dollar to Remember, Carrington said.

With the fund-raiser, they will donate the money to the memorial that is to be made in honor of King in Washington near the Vietnam Memorial, Carrington said.

"If we could get every K-State student to donate one dollar, we could make a major contribution to the memorial," Carrington said.

For anyone who wishes to contribute to the fund-raiser, there will be a booth set up at the vigil and also in the Union during Martin Luther King Jr. week, Jan. 20-24, Carrington said.

Fallon said it is important for people to remember what King was trying to accomplish.

"He impressed me as a sincere man of God who felt a calling to bring the people of America together," he said.

Weekend game might bring end to 24-game losing streak with KU

By Joel Reichenberger
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

There's a chance.

When K-State meets Kansas in Lawrence on Saturday, the Cats might be towing their best opportunity for a win in several years.

The Cats hope to take advantage of their improving defense to catch the Jayhawks offguard. K-State will also be looking to end a trend toward disaster following big wins under Coach Jim Wooldridge.

In the 2000-01 and 2001-02 campaigns, Wooldridge's teams held opponents to 72 and 70 points per game, respectively. Those numbers were down from 75 points per game in the season before Wooldridge took over and have continued to decrease this season.

In 15 games this season, Cat opponents have averaged only 61 points.

The heart of that effort has been forcing teams into unfamiliar positions and uncomfortable shots.

Junior guard Tim Ellis said that was the case against then-No. 23 Texas Tech on Jan. 11.

"We really wanted to slow down their transition," he said. "They were scoring over 20 points just in transition alone, so I said take that away and we'll be all right."

The Cats were all right – to the tune of a 68-44 victory over the Red Raiders.

On Wednesday night at Colorado, though, the momentum didn't carry over. K-State couldn't muster much from the free-throw line and struggled with ball control en route to a 69-63 loss.

But it wasn't the first time the Cats have beaten a ranked opponent early in conference play only to stumble afterwards.

In 2000, Wooldridge's first season at the helm, K-State dominated No. 20 Missouri 80-59 only to lose its next seven games and finish 3-11 in the Big 12.

Last season, K-State defeated then-No. 9 Oklahoma State, 70-61, and a tough Texas squad, 71-70.

They then lost five of their next seven games to finish the league slate 6-10.

Saturday's game against KU could be an opportunity for the Cats to alter that trend and take advantage of any remaining momentum gained from the Texas Tech contest.

If that's to happen, though, the Cats' defense, 20th in the nation, will have to stop KU's top-rated offense.

KU averages 88 points per game, 16 more than the Wildcats allow.

While K-State has had success stopping marquee conference players, including holding Tech's Andre Emmett – the Big 12's leading scorer – below his season average, the Jayhawks feature a multi-faceted attack.

The Cats will face two preseason all-Americans in seniors Nick Collison and Kirk Hinrich. They also will have to contend with sophomore guard Keith Langford. All three Jayhawks average more than 16 points.

How well K-State defends its opponents will determine how successful the Cats will be this season, Wooldridge said. If they hope to muster some momentum after the Texas Tech win, they will have to continue to play stelfar defense.

"If we don't defend, and we don't rebound, it's going to be very difficult for our teams to win," Wooldridge said. "It is the cornerstone of our team. As we continue to get better at it, it provides us with a better chance to win."

As for the Cats' chances to end KU's 24-game winning streak over K-State, Wooldridge said his team has to play together.

"We're not a star-studded team. We are a team that has to play well together and play with great energy," Wooldridge said. "I don't know that we have a player that can just go take a game over.

"Everything has to come together for us, and when it does, we can play good basketball."

Wildcat victory over KU still possible despite change in 8 game winning streak

BEN FEHR

All good things must end.

Party-pooper Colorado ended K-State's eight-game winning streak Wednesday.

Still, K-State is 10-5 and off to its best start since 1998 thanks to basketball minister Jim "Wooly" Wooldridge and a bible called the triangle offense.

Bring on KU.

I was in seventh grade the last time K-State topped the Jayhawks, so you could say the Wildcats are due.

Can K-State beat KU? Yes. Thanks be to the NFL playoffs for making impossible possible.

But it's going to take an effort the likes of which Wooldridge's bunch may be unable to muster. That, and a total meltdown in every area of KU's game.

But there are weaknesses to KU's game.

When you think about KU basketball, you think about run-and-gun basketball. But where does this speed come from?

Where do the Jayhawks summon their energy?

Allen Fieldhouse.

This tiny venue, constructed in the early 1800s, used to be a toilet bowl factory that kept the greater Midwest in proper waste disposal.

However, vibrations from the Buick-sized porcelain presses seriously compromised the then-Henry Waste Disposal Incorporated's infrastructure.

And when the University of Kansas invented basketball in 1858, it became clear that a venue would be needed to host the growing basketball legacy in Lawrence.

Thus, optimistic used car salesman and sometime Coach Phog Allen purchased the joint, named the place after himself, and secured his place in history.

Wildcat women look to tie best start ever against struggling Nebraska

By Dan Smith
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

As magical a season as K-State's women turned in last year, the 2002-03 squad is threatening to trump that effort with a storybook tale of its own.

The next chapter comes at 2 p.m. Sunday, when the No. 4 Wildcats (16-1, 3-0) visit struggling Nebraska (7-6, 0-2).

K-State is a win in Lincoln away from tying the school's best start ever, a 17-1 burst that led to a Sweet 16 berth in the NCAA Tournament last season.

A Husker squad, still struggling to find consistency on offense, stands in the way.

Nebraska is 11th in the Big 12 in scoring average, 61 points per game, and field-goal efficiency, 39 percent.

Nebraska's latest outing – a 74-54 loss at No. 23 Colorado on Tuesday – illustrated the point.

After hitting eight of their first 12 shots to open the game, the Huskers stumbled to a 31-percent finish from the field.

History says things could be different in the Bob Devaney Sports Center on Sunday, though.

Nebraska owns a seven-game home winning streak over the Cats, including a 67-52 win over then-No. 11 K-State last February.

Junior Alexa Johnson and senior Amanda Cleveland will lead the Huskers' effort to extend that streak. Johnson, averaging 15.6 points and 7.4 rebounds per contest, is Nebraska's primary threat, and Cleveland adds 9.5 points and 8.3 rebounds down low.

The Cats' 68-60 nailbiter win over Iowa State on Wednesday night showed the importance of a good night on the boards.

K-State netted 15 second-chance points on 16 offensive rebounds and won the battle on the glass, 40-31, to extend their winning streak to 11 games.

"It's good for our team to be in close situations like that where we have to find it within ourselves to pull out in the end with a victory," sophomore forward Kendra Wecker said.

As a team, Nebraska and K-State hover around 40 rebounds per game. To say the least, the post battle should draw the most attention for both teams in preparation for Sunday's contest.

"The Big 12 is a tough conference and you never know what a team is going to throw at you on any given night," Wecker said.

"We just have to be able to respond to anything."

Boxing | Bowe gets prison for abduction

Former heavyweight champion Riddick Bowe was sentenced Thursday to 18 months in federal prison for the 1998 abduction of his estranged wife and children.

Bowe was in court for the three-minute hearing, at which U.S. District Judge Graham Mullen followed through on an appeals court's October sentencing order.

Mullen twice previously had given Bowe lighter sentences that were rejected by the appeals court.

After Bowe is released from prison, he must serve two years' supervised release.

NFL | Jaguars to hire Del Rio

The Jacksonville Jaguars hired Panthers defensive coordinator Jack Del Rio as their coach Thursday, two sources within the NFL told The Associated Press.

The 39-year-old former NFL linebacker will be introduced at a news conference Friday, according to a team source who spoke on condition of anonymity. Contract details haven't been fully worked out, but Del Rio has accepted the job, that source said.

In Del Rio's single season as coordinator for the Panthers, he helped them improve from 31st in the league to second in defense.

NBA | Roberts reinstated by NBA

Stanley Roberts was reinstated by the NBA and its players' association on Thursday, more than three years after he was kicked out of the league for failing a drug test.

The Philadelphia 76ers own the rights to the 32-year-old Roberts. If they don't want him, the 7-foot center will be eligible to sign with any team.

Roberts, who played with Shaquille O'Neal at LSU, signed a $725,000 contract with the 76ers in 1999. He was banned by the NBA the next month after testing positive for what the league said was an "amphetamine-based designer drug."

Students utilize Rec Complex to lose holiday pounds

Weight gain during holidays not uncommon; students must exercise, eat healthy in order to stay fit

By Crystal Becker
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

After a winter break of seasonal sweets and holiday delicacies, Santa isn't the only one shaking like a bowl full of jelly.

According to the American College of Sports Medicine Web site, the average American gains five to seven pounds during the holiday season.

For college students, the problem may be compounded by the stress of finals week, Dianna Schalles, health educator and registered dietitian at Lafene Health Center, said.

"Moderation is the thing that people forget a lot of times," Schalles said.

"People look at the season as a license to overeat."

Schalles said many Americans tend to consistently eat high-calorie foods from the time between Thanksgiving and New Year's, rather than celebrating only on the holidays.

In addition to unhealthy eating habits, Schalles said physical activity also decreases during the holiday season, adding to the problem.

"Students are busy studying for finals, working on final projects or shopping before the holidays," she said. "Students struggle with fitting in time for physical activity."

Molly Frier and Andrea Falk, freshmen in interior design, first came to the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex after fall semester finals.

"We came the last day after finals and then made a decision to try to start going at least four days a week," Frier said. "It's a major stress reliever."

Falk said she is trying to avoid the infamous stories of gaining weight during freshman year.

"I just feel better when I work out," she said.

"We haven't really gained weight from the holidays, we're just here more to stay in shape and to avoid the freshman 15."

However, help is available for students wanting to burn winter-break calories and begin New Year's resolutions.

Lindsay Hardwick, senior in kinesiology, is one of the five fitness consultants at the Wellness Resource Center in the Rec Complex. She said students may utilize resources on campus to lose holiday weight.

"We do fitness testing and can set up an individualized exercise program," Hardwick said. "We can put together a program that will fit your schedule."

Fitness consultants can measure blood pressure, body fat percentage, aerobic capacity and conduct an endurance test to determine current physical status.

The consultants also create exercise programs that include aerobics, cardiovascular workouts and strength training.

"It's geared toward the individual," Hardwick said.

"We usually sit down one-on-one with somebody and make up a workout that fits their schedule and fitness level."

Tiffany Bullard, junior in nutrition and kinesiology, is also a fitness consultant at the Rec. Bullard said she has already seen an increase in students using the facilities.

"There have been more people coming in since after New Years," she said. "I've also been helping students by suggesting how to improve their diet."

"We evaluate what they've eaten in the last 24 hours and from there, go over the food pyramid guide," she said.

"After meeting with students, it is then up to them to make additional appointments so we can track their progress."

Schalles also offers one-on-one dieting advice at Lafene.

"The number one thing I tell students is to try to be sensible–don't diet, just try to improve eating and the physical aspect," she said. "Don't think you have to be perfect and do it overnight, just make some progress."

Dieting just sets people up for binge eating and disappointment, Schalles said.

"Diets usually don't work," she said.

"I individualize students' nutrient needs and give them some general framework based on their lifestyle. I try to help them find activities that they enjoy so they get the other beneficial aspects of physical activity, aside from weight control."

Schalles said there are many activities to choose from when trying to lose weight.

"Build a social aspect into exercise," she said. "Walk with a buddy, sign up for a credit class like weight training or golf, or aerobics classes at Ahearn or the Rec – anything to get out and get moving."

COLUMN | Wildcats must ignore KU silliness to win

systems to aid the badly deteriorated ceilings and walls. But that was a long time ago.

Williams knows this. He needs only tell his players how useful running quickly can be when debris is falling from some 30 stories above, and he'll have a pretty frisky bunch.

Remember, at home, the Jayhawks aren't just running to recover the splendor and glory lost in Lawrence since the 1988 National Championship.

They're running for their lives.

K-State, no longer in the dark about the condition of one of the world's oldest standing structures, should now be able to match KU's on-court speed.

But the Jayhawks will come at the Wildcats with a number of big bodies down low as well.

Center Nick Collison, paired with thug Jeff Graves and god knows who else down low, will use his camel-like strength to wear down K-State defenders in the paint.

But Collison, like Greg Ogre-tag and Eric Chenoworth before him, has a big problem. Or, more correctly, a problem with being big.

Jean Peters, head psychologist at Rolling Meadows Sanitarium in Rochester, N.Y., said Collison's condition is no laughing matter.

"People with giantism feel physical pain when battering those of smaller stature," she said. "Nick and those like him don't want to dunk the ball in your grille or funk up your process with elbows.

"Nick doesn't want to hit you. He wants to hug you."

K-State should be able to use Collison's humble nature against him Saturday.

But giantism and urgency aside, the great equalizer for KU basketball is the rock chalk cheer.

KU fans, sometimes 13,000 strong, can create a volume that, while endangering their lives with its vibrations in the rickety field house, is no doubt intimidating.

But should opponents really be afraid? What is it about the rocking of chalk that frightens?

When you think about it, chalk can't rock. It's just, well, it's just chalk. And K-State is going to have to overcome such silliness if they're going to leave Lawrence with a win this weekend.

Bush: U.S. will wait to respond to Iraqi warheads

By Robert Burns
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON – The Bush administration adopted a wait-and-see stance Thursday in response to the discovery of 11 empty chemical warheads at an ammunition dump in Iraq.

White House spokesman Ari Fleischer said the administration was assessing the information out of Baghdad and would be deliberate about reacting to it.

Another spokesman, Scott McClellan, said the administration was "aware of the reports and we look forward to receiving information from the inspectors." McClellan, who accompanied the president on a trip to Scranton, Pa., would not comment on how significant the find was.

The 122mm shells are the same type as were discovered by U.N. inspectors in October 1991 at an Iraqi munitions storage depot near Khamisiyah. At that time, inspectors found 297 mostly-intact 122mm rockets containing the nerve agents sarin and cyclosarin in an excavated area.

In February and March 1992, the U.N. inspectors found and destroyed 463 122mm rockets at Khamisiyah, which the inspectors described as "fully-, partially- and unfilled rockets."

The revelations came as Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld was lamenting the inability of Congress to approve money to pay the multi-billion-dollar cost for the buildup of U.S. troops.

The Bush White House has grown increasingly impatient with the pace of inspections under the supervision of the United Nations, and the president declared earlier this week that time was running out for Saddam Hussein to avoid war.

The weapons components found Thursday were not part of Iraq's declaration given to the U.N. in December, under which Baghdad was required to itemize its weapons of mass destruction.

HEALTHY EATING

Eating right can benefit overall health, help in stress management

By Courtney Duffield
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A common New Year's resolution is to lose weight, but with late-night pizza orders, fast food runs and residence hall food, eating healthy can be difficult.

"We get slammed on weekends, depending on what is going on," said Dusty Thomas, assistant manager of Pizza Shuttle.

The bulk of Pizza Shuttle's college orders are at night, but it depends on the day. Thomas said late-night orders can be equal to or surpass the dinner rush.

"The most popular college order is cheese bread," Thomas said. "Because of its popularity, we recently added a large."

Thomas said the most fattening part of a pizza is the cheese, but it is a good source of carbohydrates.

"If you really want to be healthy, order it without cheese," Thomas said. "I don't like my pizza without cheese, but surprisingly a Farm Shuttle without cheese is a very common order."

Most people hear about the benefits of long-term healthy eating, but aren't focused on daily rewards Dianna Schalles, Lafene nutritionist, said.

"I try to get students to eat healthy for today. This also helps with weight control," Schalles said. "I try to get students to eat for energy. Skipping meals and poor quality meals can leave students feeling zapped."

Proper nutrition leads to better overall health and stress management, Schalles said.

"When students don't eat healthy, they typically are cranky and deal with stress less effectively," she said.

There are no specific foods that students should eat when they feel fatigued, but Schalles said the important thing to know is whether an individual's blood sugar is too low or too high and eat accordingly.

A healthy, well-balanced diet should consist of approximately 30 percent fat, 15 percent protein and 55 percent carbohydrates, she said.

"The thing to remember is saturated fats are solid at room temperature," Schalles said. "Mono- and polysaturated fats consist of vegetable oil, olive oil, canola oil and peanut oil, which are effective on cholesterol."

If you are living in a community living situation, such as a sorority, fraternity or scholarship house, eating healthy can be difficult. Shalles said steps students can take to eat healthier are forming committees to voice concerns, staying positive and possibly having a dietitian give a presentation on healthy eating to the group.

"You're paying to live there," Schalles said. "You should have a voice about what you eat."

Schalles said eating fresh fruit and canned fruit are ways to incorporate fruit into a healthy diet.

"I know it has to be quick and simple," Schalles said.

Healthier eating can become more convenient if you have healthy food options ready to go, Schalles said. Prepare ahead of time and place them in plastic bags or portable containers.

Planning healthy meals and snacks each weekend can help on days that are going to be more hectic. Schalles said it is important for college students to be aware of time management, skipping meals and soda intake when trying to eat healthy.

"Soda consumption can drain the pocketbook and drain energy," Schalles said.

"It is often used as a substitution for meals and is only a temporary energizer."

Healthy snacks

- High fiber cereal
- Whole grain crackers
- Low-fat yogurt
- Fresh fruit
- Raisins and other dried fruits
- Peanut butter sandwich
- Raw vegetables, plain or with low-fat or non-fat dressing

SNOW | Road crews work to diminish accidents due to slick conditions

Thursday.

"We were able to get some salt and some de-icer material down before, but it began to accumulate so we had to plow all of our major routes," he said. "It was a pretty uneventful storm. Accumulation wasn't that great and although the wind did blow some, it didn't create significant problems for us."

It did create a problem for some motorists however.

Lt. Kurt Moldrup of the Riley County Police Department said 32 accidents were reported from the time precipitation began until late Thursday afternoon.

"Of the accidents reported, two were injury accidents, causing minor injuries, and four caused less then $500 damage," he said. "The rest were over that or were injury accidents."

Moldrup said the night went well considering weather conditions.

"The night was average or better than average for when we have a pretty good snow and when streets are slick," he said. "For all the students to be coming back into town and with school just starting, it creates a lot of opportunity for accidents.

Moldrup said the city did a good job of clearing up the streets right away.

For students across Manhattan, almost too good of a job.

Michele Jones, USD 383 communications director, said there were no school closings.

"Our transportation director was out driving this morning at 4 o'clock," Jones said. "It was his opinion that schools did not need to be canceled."

Knapp said that may change later this winter.

"They've started talking about a possibility of snow next week, but the weekend looks to be dry," she said. "The question becomes, 'What will happen with the next storm?"

Knapp said that although the southern part of the state has seen more snow in December 2002, Manhattan residents should expect more precipitation.

"The long-range outlook for the January, February and March timeframe is for above normal moisture," she said. "The question is, when will we get it?"

Knapp said normal moisture patterns suggest later this spring.

"You usually get double the amount of precipitation in March than you do in February," she said. "If the forecast holds true for the normal time frame, this is only the beginning."

Knapp said it's possible to receive snowfall well into April.

"Really large snows are not unheard of or even uncommon as late as April," she said. "We've recorded 7 inches of snow as late as May 26."

Knapp said if temperatures warm up this spring we can expect a rainy March instead.

"Despite the warm weather we had last week, you can't bundle away your winter clothes yet," she said.

IRAQ | Chief UN inspectors say weapons declaration is incomplete

has begun a heavy military buildup in the Persian Gulf, has threatened war on Iraq if it is found to be hiding banned weapons programs.

The Iraqi government says it no longer has any chemical, biological or nuclear weapons and submitted a declaration to the United Nations that it said proved its case.

Ueki told The Associated Press that the shells were not accounted for in the report. "It was a discovery. They were not declared," he said.

But Lt. Gen. Hossam Mohammed Amin, the chief Iraqi liaison officer to the inspection teams, said they were short-range shells imported in 1988 and mentioned in Iraq's December declaration.

Amin said the inspection team found the munitions in a sealed box that had never been opened and was covered by dust and bird droppings.

Chief inspectors Hans Blix and Mohamed ElBaradei have said Iraq's weapons declaration is incomplete – failing in particular to support its claims to have destroyed missiles, warheads and chemical agents such as VX nerve gas.

Blix and ElBaradei have stepped up demands that Iraq improve cooperation and are headed to Baghdad to meet officials Sunday and Monday and seek more information.

SMALLPOX | Kansas outlines plan for vaccinations

EMS workers. The third phase, expected to take place as early as next year, will include the general public wishing to receive the smallpox vaccine.

Watson said the KDHE has been working with the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention to prepare local departments and governments for bioterrorism.

"This is a federal program that the states have been asked to carry out," Watson said. "We don't know any exact dates yet. Right now we're just waiting to receive the vaccine."

Once vaccines do arrive, however, health care and health department workers can expect to visit one of the eight clinics across the state to receive the vaccine and to train.

"If an outbreak does occur, these will be the people on the front lines administering the vaccine," Watson said.

"They will receive training on how to give someone the vaccine and to recognize vaccine side effects."

Watson said clinic sites will include Topeka, Parsons, Overland Park, Kansas City, Kan., Great Bend, McPherson, Garden City and Wichita.

"We've targeted health care and health department workers in counties with cities of 10,000 people or more, totaling 25 counties and 43 hospitals," she said.

Vivian Nutsch, infection control coordinator at Mercy Health Center, said several Mercy employees have volunteered for vaccinations.

What happens if there is a smallpox outbreak in Manhattan before vaccines become available to the public? According to the CDC, there are currently enough vaccines to vaccinate every person in the United States.

Donna Hart, Riley County Bioterrorism Preparedness and Response Planning Coordinator, said emergency response depends on the situation.

"If there was an outbreak affecting a large number of people, we would work with emergency departments and the federal government," Hart said.

Hart said they have considered using campus buildings for vaccinations.

Dr. Jay Reppert, medical director at Lafene Health Center, said Lafene would report a smallpox case to the KDHE.

"Our job is to become suspicious to the symptoms of the disease and report it from there," he said.

Watson said the state is more prepared for a bioterrorist attack than in the past.

"We're certainly more prepared than we were before 9/11," she said. "There are always the general vaccinations, but this national program is the first of its kind– to vaccinate for something that has been eradicated worldwide."

VACCINE | Medicine can cause negative reactions

care is required.

How is the vaccine administered?

It is not like most shots given with a hypodermic needle.

A two-pronged bifurcated needle is dipped into the vaccine solution and is used to prick a small area of skin, usually on the upper arm, several times in a few seconds – as much as 15 times, according to Cathy Berry, associate clinical director at Lafene Health Center.

Who should not receive the vaccine, unless exposed to smallpox?

Individuals should not get vaccinated for smallpox if they have the following conditions or if they live with someone who does:

Eczema

Certain skin conditions, including burns, chicken pox, shingles, herpes, psoriasis or severe acne.

Weakened immune systems

Pregnancy or planning to become pregnant within one month of the vaccine

Individuals who are allergic to the smallpox vaccine, are younger than 12 months, have a severe short-term illness or are currently breast-feeding also should not receive the vaccine.

Side effects and risks

People may experience reactions considered normal, serious or life-threatening.

Normal reactions

A red, itchy bump develops at the vaccine site in three or four days

During the first week after vaccination, the bump becomes a large pus-filled blister that eventually dries to form a scab

A sore arm, fever and body aches are common

One out of three people feel bad enough to miss work or have trouble sleeping

Serious reactions

About 1,000 out of 1 million people vaccinated for the first time experience serious reactions. These include:

A rash or outbreak or sores, limited to a specific area or widespread

A toxic or allergic reaction that causes various forms of a rash

Life-threatening reactions

Life-threatening reactions are rare. Between one and two people per 1 million people vaccinated may die from the vaccine. Between 14 and 52 people per 1 million people experience these reactions:

Eczema vaccinatum, a serious skin rash caused by widespread infection, affecting people with eczema or atopic dermatitis

Progressive vaccinia, an ongoing infection of skin causing tissue destruction and frequently leading to death.

Postvaccinal encephalitis, an inflammation of the brain

SEBELIUS | Governor downsizes transportation funding, attempts to save higher education from further cuts

classified staff salaries will be included in this classification.

Kansas Representative Sydney Carlin, D-Manhattan, said she was very surprised and pleased to see a salary increase for state workers.

"It's good to see that she is trying to take care of the people that are taking care of the state," she said. "She's surely realized how much these people have been giving to the state."

Sebelius' plan endorsed many actions that former Republican Gov. Bill Graves adopted in his final months in office, but she is asking lawmakers to undo about two-thirds of the cuts he issued in social services.

The plan she laid out in her address, however, wasn't without cuts, some significant.

Sebelius' proposal would eliminate the state's mandated cash flow account, take away state aid to local governments, increase fees that Kansans pay to the state and make cuts to the state's 10-year transportation program.

Kansas Senate Majority Leader Lana Oleen, R-Manhattan, said the proposed budget guidelines are a great start, but the plan will require additional revenue to work.

She said the mechanism used to spare education funding and other priorities requires that all of the money the state has be spent.

"The challenge is in holding those flat that you can't spend every penny that you have," Oleen said. "We have been so close to not paying the bills this year. It has to be considered. You have to have cash flow."

No one could expect everything to be spared, Carlin said.

"It has been a difficult year and a difficult time, and she has come through with a lot of success," Carlin said.

"I was truly surprised that she was able to do so many of the things that my constituents are telling me they care about."

One of the themes in the governor's address was working together to solve the worst fiscal crisis Kansas has seen in more than half a century.

"That word – 'together' – is important for us to have in the front of our minds and on the tips of our tongues this year," Sebelius said in her address. "Today's problems are the results of many different things. Some of it has been the slowing economy. Some of it has been past choices that were made."

"Whatever the cause, we got into this problem together, and we will get out of it together. There is no time for blame. There is no time for second-guessing. There is only time to look forward together."

Local officials are hoping to see the theme carried through the legislative session as a final budget is being crafted.

Oleen, who has served under four governors now, has worked with Republicans and Democrats. Some from rural areas. Some from urban.

Those distinctions, she said, aren't important in the end.

"The problem solvers will be the ones that get a budget delivered this year. I always pride myself in being one of those people," she said. "But the sense of cooperation that I am seeing develop in the process is encouraging."

Sebelius was not required to present a budget proposal until February, but she rolled out her plan in her address early.

Kansas law requires that the governor propose a balanced budget, which uses only existing resources. Legislators use this proposal as a basis to create their own plan. Then, the budget that is passed by the Legislature is given to the governor for approval or rejection.

While higher education was mostly spared from what could have been devastating cuts in the governor's proposal, Wefald said he realizes the university will be expected to reallocate resources to fund increases in fringe benefits and bonuses for classified employees.

"The pressure is not off – we are challenged to meet the demands of rising enrollments while retaining high quality faculty and excellent programs," he said.

— The Associated Press contributed to this story.

Budget proposals:

Fiscal 2003 changes

The budget for the 2003 fiscal year, which ends June 30, would increase by $307 million to $10.2 billion.

The changes would account for $99 million in new federal unemployment benefits, $78 million in additional tuition and fees at state universities and nearly $12 million in federal funds for homeland security.

Fiscal 2004 total

The state would spend about $27 million, or 0.3 percent, less overall in fiscal 2004, or $10.16 billion.

General fund spending

Spending from the general fund would be $4.5 billion in fiscal 2004, up $135 million, or 3.1 percent.

The state deposits most of its tax revenues in the general fund, which isn't earmarked for any specific purpose.

Taxes and fees

Sebelius did not propose any general tax increases but did recommend $9.1 million in fee increases.

She also plans to declare a tax amnesty period, under which people who owe taxes could pay them without interest.

Public schools

Elementary and secondary schools would continue to receive $3,863 per pupil.

Higher education

The higher education system would lose $5 million in general tax dollars, making its appropriation $666 million for fiscal 2004. The money would come from the Board of Regents' central office.

Social services

Before he left office, former Gov. Bill Graves ordered $30 million in cuts in the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services budget for fiscal 2003. About two-thirds would be restored.

Transportation

In fiscal year 2003 and 2004, highway projects would lose $260 million. Of that, nearly $38 million would be used to finance the Kansas Highway Patrol's operations.

State employees

State workers would receive a 1.5 percent pay raise. The state would cover $12.3 million in extra pension costs and $9.2 million in new health insurance costs in fiscal 2004.

In Memory

Ceremony honors life, work of Martin Luther King Jr.

By JJ Duncan
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Paris Rossiter bent close to the flame in his hand.

"I light this candle in memory of Martin Luther King Jr."

Rossiter, junior in art and event coordinator, hosted the ceremony and candlelight vigil in All Faiths Chapel, held to commemorate the work of the civil rights leader who was assassinated April 4, 1968.

But the evening didn't begin in the chapel.

Shuffling feet and sniffling noses were the only sounds as three lines of people met in the K-State Student Union Plaza.

Those moving quietly into the square Monday evening were doing so in remembrance of civil rights leader Martin Luther King Jr. The group was briefly addressed by the Rev. Don Fallon, who recounted a few details of his meeting with King only months before his assassination.

Fallon remembered how the presence of the man who "was short in stature with dark eyes" dominated the room, and gave his opinion on what King would think of the possibility of military action in Iraq.

"I think if King was here, one of the things he would say is no to war," Fallon said. "He would want us to search harder for a non-violent way to resolve our conflicts."

Love was the word Fallon emphasized when talking about King. And after leading the group in the hymn "We Shall Overcome," on the way to All Faiths Chapel, love was a word consistently used in connection to King.

The Bethel AME Church Choir performed before making way for a man introduced as a powerhouse, the Rev. W. Bartalette Finney. Finney's deep, loud voice reverberated off the walls as he quoted scripture and called for young people to pursue their dreams actively.

Dionica Bell, right, sophomore in broadcast journalism, and friend Fatou Mbye, left, sophomore in public relations, were two of the more-than-100 students, community members and faculty who attended services at All Faiths Chapel to honor Martin Luther King Jr.'s birthday.

But he also had a slightly less pleasant message for the audience.

"Every year, Martin Luther King Jr.'s name is unfortunately exploited in funfare not indicative of the man," Finney said before going on to compare the leader to Moses. "King was a prophet sent by God to declare to the world, 'Let my people go.'"

Finney said that people must be let go from hatred, oppression and prejudice to be truly free. Rossiter said the group was fortunate to have Finney speak at the event.

"He didn't have to be here this evening," Rossiter said. "He had many offers to speak at other places where there would be more people, and it would be more beneficial for him.

Target store set to open in June

By Abbie Whited
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

After a surge in the city's economic development, a new Target store is coming to town at the corner of Seth Child Road and Fort Riley Boulevard.

Construction has already begun on the 125,443 square foot store, which is set to open in July 2003. The Target store will anchor the Seth Child Commons, a new outdoor shopping center that will be located at the same intersection.

In addition to Target, the new shopping center will carry seven or eight other businesses on the 30-acre property.

Bo Conrad, one of the property owners, cannot release names of companies who will build in the shopping center.

However, he hopes to finalize agreements within the next 30 to 60 days to those businesses interested.

"There's been an awful lot of activity," Conrad said.

Conrad said the shopping center will consist primarily of restaurants, small retail stores and financial businesses.

Currently, Manhattan shoppers have had a various selection of discount retailers, including Walgreens, K-Mart and Wal-Mart.

Steve Zilkie, senior planner for the Community Development Department, said the opening of Target will create a new option for shoppers and give many new opportunities to the city.

"It will be a new choice because we've never had a Target before," he said.

In addition, Zilkie said when

Drivers advised to take caution this winter

By Jessica Packard
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

As Manhattan streets become busier after a month-long break, safety for drivers during the winter weather becomes an issue.

Brad Schoen, captain for the Riley County Police Department, said his first tip for drivers during bad weather is not to drive at all if you can.

"Don't drive if you don't have to," Schoen said. "If you have to go out driving, remember to slow down–it takes longer to stop, including vehicles with four-wheel drive.

"Stopping distances increase greatly as the roads worsen with the weather," he said.

Schoen and Amanda Millard, public affairs coordinator for AAA Kansas, said vehicles should be equipped with a winter driving kit in case of an emergency on the highway or rural roads.

"Have blankets and extra clothing in the car in case your car goes off a ditch and you'll be waiting a while for help," Schoen said.

Schoen said it would also be advisable to take a cell phone in case of an emergency.

Besides packing a winter driving kit, Millard said there are several other tips drivers can follow when driving during winter conditions, such as wearing a seatbelt at all times and avoid driving when fatigued.

In addition, she said there were a number of vehicular precautions to take.

Safety Checklist

Scott Holeman, communication director for the Kansas Insurance Department, said there is a simple checklist for the driver and passengers to follow in case of an accident to ensure safety:

- ❑ Stop in a safe place, turn off the ignition and check for injuries.
- ❑ Call 911 or Campus Police Safety Officials immediately.
- ❑ Get the name, address, phone number, driver's license number of the driver and the owner if persons differ.
- ❑ Write down the time, date, location, and road conditions of the accident.
- ❑ Write the year and make of the vehicles involved in the accident, along with the damages entailed and your account of the incident.
- ❑ Notify your insurance agent.

Because the weather often affects the vehicle, drivers should make sure tires are at the proper pressure and to keep the gas tank at least half-full to avoid the gas-line freezing.

Above all else, Millard said to have the vehicle checked with a mechanic to ensure all systems are operating properly.

Scott Holeman, communication director for the Kansas Insurance Department, said winter storms could mean roads are dangerous.

In addition, he said that snow and ice

Mercy plans relocations, consolidations in 2003

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Mercy Regional Health Center hopes to create a "one stop shop" for physical fitness.

During the summer, Mercy will consolidate its Sunset Avenue Health and Fitness Center, Occupational Health Department and Outpatient Rehabilitation in a new location in the Town West shopping center at 315 South Seth Child Road.

The decision was made to relocate the three departments to a common facility because of their similar services and client base, as well as their shared need for additional space.

The Occupational Health Department presently operates out of the emergency room at 1823 College Avenue, a setting that Dr. Joseph Schlageck says doesn't fit his department.

The majority of cases treated

Corrections and clarifications

There were errors in Friday's Collegian. The letter to the editor was submitted by Carmen Wright, graduate student in business. In a story on the Greek Odyssey Cafe, Jason McGraw, Union executive chef, said that the food is not only good — it is intended to be healthy. The Collegian regrets the errors.

FACES IN THE CROWD

Filmmaker believes reality shows create false illusions of success

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

Spike Lee says he isn't a fan of reality TV shows that create the illusion that success is the result of luck rather than hard work.

"They trick people into thinking (they don't need) to do their homework or woodshedding," the filmmaker said Wednesday at the opening of Penn State-Behrend's monthlong Martin Luther King Jr. celebration.

"If people believe that, they're crazy."

Lee, 45, said he didn't make his first film until he had graduated from Atlanta's Morehouse College and studied at New York University's Institute of Film and Television.

His films include "She's Gotta Have It," "Do the Right Thing," "Malcolm X" and "25th Hour," now in theaters nationwide.

Williams outfit becomes history

Remember the skintight outfit Serena Williams wore in the U.S. Open? It's history.

"Catsuit is retired," the 21-year-old said Thursday. "You can see it in a museum."

Serena and her sister, Venus, have never been shy about pushing fashion boundaries on the tennis courts, but Serena's jet-black outfit that stretched from neck to mid-thigh set a benchmark.

She wore the catsuit four times in the U.S. Open and then left it in the closet until the season-ending Tour Championships.

Forest dedicated to Clash singer

Late punk icon Joe Strummer's efforts to counter global warming will live on as a forest in his honor.

Future Forests, a group the Clash singer-songwriter helped found in the 1990s, asked fans to donate to help create the living memorial on the Isle of Skye in Scotland.

"Joe said 'Bands must be contributing to global warming by their buses, equipment trucks and the diesel used to power the stages,'" the group's spokesman said, "'Can you imagine how much carbon dioxide the pressing and the distribution of a CD creates? What shall we do about it?'"

Strummer decided to plant trees to offset the carbon dioxide created by his work.

Many scientists believe that the burning of fossil fuels is causing an increase in atmospheric carbon dioxide, triggering what is called the greenhouse effect. A higher concentration of carbon dioxide in the atmosphere traps more of the sun's heat, possibly causing temperatures to rise.

The spokesman said the forest would eventually be a home to hundreds of wildlife species, including otters, red deer and foxes.

Strummer, a diplomat's son, died Dec. 22 at age 50.

The Clash will be inducted into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame in March. The band emerged from the 1970s London punk explosion, and was commercially successful by punk standards.

Scorsese honored with achievement

The Directors Guild of America will honor director Martin Scorsese with a lifetime achievement award during its 55th annual awards ceremony March 1, officials said.

The director of "Gangs of New York" will become the 30th recipient of the award, which is the organization's highest tribute.

Scorsese, 60, has a directing career spanning more than four decades and his work includes: "Taxi Driver," "The Age of Innocence," "Raging Bull," "Casino" and "GoodFellas."

On Sunday, he won a best director Golden Globe.

He is being honored for nurturing young filmmakers and his fight to preserve the legacy of motion picture art for future generations, said guild president Martha Coolidge.

"There are few who have impacted our industry in the numerous ways that Marty has," Coolidge said. "Marty's footprints are beside those of our past recipients."

The most recent recipient of the Guild's lifetime achievement award was director Steven Spielberg in 2000. Other winners include: Francis Ford Coppola, Stanley Kubrick, Orson Welles, Alfred Hitchcock, Frank Capra and John Ford.

Honorees are selected by present and past Guild presidents.

Lee concerned with film content

Filmmaker Spike Lee says he's concerned that young moviegoers will form their first impressions of civil rights icons Rosa Parks and Martin Luther King Jr. from a bitter character in last year's comedy "Barbershop."

The keynote speaker at two events Saturday honoring King's birthday, Lee told hundreds of teenagers at the Lauderhill Boys & Girls Club that he didn't laugh when he heard a character played by Cedric the Entertainer belittle Parks' refusal to move to the back of the bus.

Lee also didn't find it funny when the character accused King of being sexually promiscuous.

But Lee said too many adults do laugh at those scenes. Instead, he said they should be teaching young children about the accomplishments, challenges and sacrifices of the leaders of the civil rights movement.

"To me, some things aren't funny," said Lee, who grew up in Brooklyn, N.Y. "If our young children grow up thinking this, and that's all they know about, then we're in trouble."

Actors perform in honor of King

Glover, Justice to present act tonight

By Lindsey Tipling
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Danny Glover and Felix Justice will perform a two-man theatrical presentation at 7 tonight in McCain Auditorium.

Called "A Night With Martin Luther King and Langston Hughes," Glover and Justice will read works by King and black poet and author Hughes, said Matt Pruett, president of the Union Program Council.

The event is part of the weeklong celebration of the life of Martin Luther King Jr., he said.

"We think that it will be an event that will represent the week well," Pruett said. "We hope people enjoy coming out to it."

The UPC, the Black Student Union, the University Distinguished Lectures Committee and the Office of Diversity and Dual Career Development are sponsoring the event, he said.

Glover has starred in movies such as "Places in the Heart," "The Color Purple" and the "Lethal Weapon" series. Justice has performed in theatrical productions including "Blues for Mr. Charlie," "Henry V," "High on Pilet's Bluff" and "The River Niger."

Danny Glover
ACTOR

Paris Rossiter, president of BSU, said the event is worth attending.

"It should be very good," he said.

The program will last about an hour, Pruett said, with time for questions from the audience at the end.

"Admission is free to the public, and we hope to have a full house," he said.

Pruett said the event definitely will benefit students and members of the community.

"It will really be a good opportunity for students and the community to come out to an event that celebrates the life of Dr. King," he said.

President Bush invokes Martin Luther King Jr.'s legacy of promoting further civil rights action

By Scott Lindlaw
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

LANDOVER, Md. – President Bush, evoking the memory of Martin Luther King Jr., proclaimed Monday "there is still work to do" to fulfill the assassinated civil rights leader's dream of equality in America.

"It is fitting that we honor Martin Luther King in a church," Bush said, "because I believe, like you, that the power of his words, the clarity of his vision, the courage of his leadership, occurred because he put his faith in the Almighty."

"It is fitting that we honor this great American in a church because, out of church comes the notion of equality and justice," the president said at the First Baptist Church of Glenarden.

"Even though progress has been made," he said, "there is still work to do. There is still prejudice. ... There's still a need for us to hear the words of Martin Luther King so that the word of hope reaches everywhere in the land."

To strong applause, he noted that while the government can write checks through various assistance programs, "it can't put hope in people's hearts."

Introduced by the Rev. William Jones as a "very, very special guest," Bush, accompanied by his wife, Laura, received a standing ovation from the predominantly black congregation.

"We don't know how you feel about him personally, but he is the president of the United States," Jones said, to loud cheers.

Bush's appearance came at a time when his decisions on affirmative action and judicial nominations have brought criticism.

To coincide with the holiday, the White House announced Sunday the president will propose increasing spending by 5 percent for grants to historically black colleges, universities, graduate programs and Hispanic education institutions.

Last week, the administration asked the Supreme Court to declare the University of Michigan's affirmative action admissions policies unconstitutional.

It argued in a brief that policies at the university and its law school fail the constitutional test of equal protection under the law, and ignore race-neutral alternatives that could boost minority presence on campuses.

Bush was not required to take a position in the case, but by doing so, he infuriated some black leaders.

The decision prompted Jesse Jackson to call Bush "the most anti-civil rights president in 50 years."

Secretary of State Colin Powell, one of two black Cabinet members, said Sunday he disagreed with the president's stance on the Michigan admission policies.

Education Secretary Rod Paige, who also is black, said he agreed with Bush.

The new program money announced by will improve financial stability for historically black institutions.

TO THE POINT

Before it's too late, express war sentiments to Congress

A declaration of war in Iraq looms, and thousands have protested war efforts in the nation's capital within the past week.

Counter-protests arose shortly thereafter.

Regardless of their viewpoints, the groups realized one key fact: the time to voice an opinion is now. Whether it be through letters to Congress or letters to the Collegian, the time that opinions matter most is before war is declared.

To the point is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

While the U.S. military build-up in the Persian Gulf region continues, and war and post-war plans are being drawn in Washington to deal with Iraq, the issue still hangs in the balance.

Presidential primaries and caucuses begin in early 2004, and President Bush needs success in Iraq to help him at the election booths. According to U.S.A. Today, about 70 percent of Americans do not believe that Bush has made a good case for going to war with Iraq.

Reports have been published saying that if the United States goes to war, it may not be for several weeks or months.

In this time before a possible attack, concerned citizens need to take a proactive approach in trying to influence their senators and representatives as well as their fellow citizens.

At K-State, this can be done by writing letters to Opinion Editor Paul Restivo at letters@spub.ksu.edu, joining demonstrations on campus and better utilizing the Campus Fourum as your voice.

Perhaps a more effective method of influencing the U.S. government would be to write to Kansas' elected officials. Senators Sam Brownback and Pat Roberts will look to the views of their state for feedback on how to support the war effort in Iraq. Kansas senators can be reached at the following addresses:

EYE OPENER

Experiencing other cultures helps to shape accurate worldview

Illustrations by Jeff Yeung | COLLEGIAN

MICAH HAWKINSON

I took a two-week trip to Ecuador during the winter break. I returned with a trunk full of souvenirs, two legs full of mosquito bites and a pitiful fraction of a beard.

But I learned about more on my vacation than my inability to grow facial hair in any meaningful way. My overseas trek forced me to come to terms with my position as a citizen of the world.

From the moment I stepped off the plane in Quito, I was in the middle of an enormously unfamiliar culture and society. I kept doing double takes throughout my stay.

For instance, I was shocked to find that newly elected president Lucio Gutierrez was an active colonel in the Ecuadorian army. During the campaign, he actually posed in uniform for his posters.

That would never fly in the United States. We get nervous enough when the odd draft-dodging president starts to get a little too friendly with the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

I guess we're scared that he'll pull a Hugo Chavez and decide not to leave when it's someone else's turn to move into the White House.

Nonetheless, Ecuadorians elected Gutierrez, who ran on a platform of eliminating corruption in the corporate and financial sectors. I guess most Ecuadorians would rather risk a military regime than put up with corporate corruption. And who can blame them?

U.S. and Ecuadorian mindsets differ in more than political ideals. Even something as fundamental as friendship takes different shapes in each country. Here in the States, a nod is often sufficient for greeting an acquaintance.

Ecuadorian greetings are more physical – even among people who don't know one another very well. Men often hug one another, and they kiss young women on the cheek.

Unfortunately, there are more complicated rules about that. For example, if a girl is romantically involved with a guy, stupid norteamericanos with half-beards probably shouldn't kiss her. Trust me – I know this.

Although all these differences between Ecuador and the United States were huge, the one that hit me the hardest was probably the economy.

I am obscenely wealthy compared to the average Ecuadorian. A middle-class family makes about 350 U.S. dollars per month, according to Ecuador's Ministry of the Economy. The dollar is worth about twice or three times as much there, but $350 is still nothing to write home to mother about.

And those are the people who are pretty well off. A lot of Ecuadorians live on a subsistence level. In the mountains where we were, they scrape out a living by raising yucca or bananas on rocky hillsides. They might manage to sell what little they don't eat, but that doesn't bring more than a pittance.

They have almost nothing.

Mea.. while, here I am in a pair of neakers that cost more cash than they see in a month. And the sneakers are from my local Payless ShoeSource.

In just a couple of short weeks, I gained something I will never lose: the realization that other people around the world live differently than I do. It seems obvious and self-explanatory to say that, but I'm convinced no one can truly believe that if she or he hasn't experienced another culture firsthand.

If you want to have a well-rounded, more accurate view of the world and your niche in it, I would recommend leaving the States for a while. Study abroad if you can, but even a couple of weeks between semesters will help you expand your mind and worldview.

If you go with an open, observing mind, you'll return a changed person. I know I did.

Abuse of animals merits outlawing Old West sport, rodeo

LINDSEY PRAECHTER

As rodeo season approaches, brave and strong cowboys look forward to risking their lives taming the wildest of farm animals, cows and horses. These naturally evil and aggressive beasts do all they can to provoke the average cowboys onto their backs so they can buck them off in a matter of seconds.

In reality, bulls, calves and horses are exploited by thousands of people who attend and participate in rodeos.

They are poked, prodded and shocked into being violent and aggressive animals. In many cases, this is done only to prove the participants' luck, not talent.

Bulls and broncos are prepared beforehand for bucking events by having a "flank strap" attached tightly to their abdomens. The strap is belted so tightly around their bodies that they buck violently to remove it. The animal does not stop bucking until it is removed.

In addition to the uncomfortable strap, the riders have spurs attached to their boots to provoke bucking. When rodeos have loose regulations, these spurs can be as sharp as mini saw blades that slice from shoulder to hip as the rider struggles to stay on.

The bulls and broncos use every defense to stop the pain they are withstanding and unknowingly play into the entertainment of the vicious sport.

Riders prove nothing other than luck when they manage to stay on a particular bronco or bull for a sustained amount of time. If the animal doesn't buck as hard as another, the rider has an advantage that has nothing to do with talent.

Baby cows can suffer death in the name of entertainment in the calf-roping event.

The cruelty of the sport shines as calves run for their lives into the arena, only to be followed on one side by a horseback rider and roped around the neck by another. This motion can be so sudden that the calf is airborne as it is jerked to a stop. Then it is wrestled to the ground with a neck-breaking motion and hog tied with its legs in the air to finish the event.

The calves leave this event with rope burns around their necks and ankles.

There is potential for many other injuries. The most obvious one is the breaking of the calf's neck. The roper twists the calf's head so hard that it falls to the ground after already being choked and whiplashed by a rope.

Calves can also sustain injuries to their larynx, broken legs and burns along their back from being wrestled with on the arena floor.

This event does require talent in roping and horseback riding, but the extreme cruelty exhibited proves what a poor excuse of a sport it is.

Unlike the participants in the rodeo, these animals do not choose to participate in these events. Danger is obvious to the humans involved, but the animals cannot choose. Animals are used year after year, continuing a life full of stress and struggles.

This event does require talent in roping and horseback riding, but the extreme cruelty exhibited proves what a poor excuse of a sport it is.

Organizations like the Professional Rodeo Cowboys Association (PRCA) create rules to reduce the abuse of the rodeo animals, but not all rodeos abide by their rulings. Riders may still have sharp, serrating spurs.

Animals may be prodded by electrocuting sticks more than necessary at these events. There are thousands of rodeos each year, and not all are monitored.

Rodeo has been banned in Britain and Australia, and in parts of the United States and Europe because of its cruel implications. Many vets agree that roping events should be discontinued entirely due to the obvious injuries they cause.

The events in rodeo are not all as extensively cruel to animals as those mentioned, but as entertainment, the value is low.

The Old West that created these events does not exist anymore. Animals like bulls do not need to be provoked and exploited to fulfill the traditions of the past.

Animals suffer at the hands of humans for nothing besides pure entertainment value. This entertainment is abusive to the most docile creatures on this planet.

This is an American tradition that should be discarded and forgotten.

Iraqi officials agree with steps

By Charles J. Hanley
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

BAGHDAD, Iraq – The chief U.N. arms inspectors and Iraqi officials agreed Monday on practical steps to greater Iraqi cooperation in the U.N. disarmament program, including Baghdad's encouragement of weapons scientists to submit to private U.N. interviews.

Head weapons inspector Hans Blix and Mohamed ElBaradei, head of the U.N. nuclear agency, arrived Sunday as the United States warned time was running out for Baghdad to comply with U.N. orders to eliminate all its chemical, biological and nuclear weapons or face attack.

The two said after the talks that substantive issues, such as a complete accounting of old Iraqi chemical and biological weapons, remain unresolved.

"These issues are open and may require time," said Blix, head of the U.N. agency responsible for Iraqi chemical and biological disarmament.

They must report next Monday to the U.N. Security Council, updating their findings and Baghdad's compliance with the U.N. oversight regime that resumed Nov. 27 to certify that Iraq has no weapons of mass destruction.

Blix would not say whether that report would be upbeat or pessimistic, but he said of the discussions here: "There are a number of points which would have otherwise been negative but which have now been turned around."

The head of the Iraqi delegation to the talks, presidential science adviser Amir al-Saadi, described the talks as "very constructive and positive."

The United States and Britain insist President Saddam Hussein's government still maintains illegal weapons and threaten war if it does not give them up. U.S. Navy flotillas and military units have been converging on the seas and deserts of the Middle East.

In neighboring Turkey, where the government has hesitated to grant permission for deployment of U.S. troops, Gen. Richard Myers, chairman of the U.S. Joint Chiefs of Staff, met with Turkish defense officials on Monday.

The United States reportedly had planned to base up to 80,000 soldiers in Turkey, but given Turkey's opposition, the United States is considering scaling back that request to between 15,000 and 20,000 soldiers.

Demonstrators wrap up weekend of protests against possible war

By David Ho
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON – Sitting on a frigid street in view of the White House and surrounded by chanting anti-war demonstrators, Sister Carole Bialock ate a cookie and smiled.

"It is a privilege to protest," she said. The 73-year-old Roman Catholic nun from Houston was in Washington for the weekend of demonstrations against a possible war with Iraq.

Many of the approximately 1,000 protesters who rallied Sunday near the White House invoked Martin Luther King's legacy on a weekend of remembrance for the slain civil rights leader.

The demonstration capped a weekend that featured a huge and peaceful rally Saturday and protests around the country and the world.

Although President Bush was at Camp David, Md., for the weekend, protesters pressed as close to the White House grounds as they could on Sunday to demand that he back off Iraq. Police swiftly arrested 16 who breached barricades.

Police forced them face down on snowy grass and bound their wrists with plastic handcuffs. They were processed on misdemeanor charges and released.

At one point Sunday, protesters flooded into a street to block traffic; police pushed and dragged them back. In the scuffle, an older woman who was part of the demonstration was pushed over.

Ambulance officials said she was one of two people sent to hospitals with minor injuries. The hospital treating the woman said it did not have her permission to release information.

Close to 500 protesters assembled first near the Justice Department and FBI headquarters to denounce what they called "racist witch hunts" by U.S. authorities following the Sept. 11 attacks.

During a mile-long march in the cold, that crowd met another of a similar size, waiting by Lafayette Park across from the White House.

GOLDEN OHLDE

Junior center does it all

By Ben Fehr
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Nicole Ohlde made her presence felt early and often against Nebraska on Sunday.

In 13 minutes of first-half action, the junior All-America and Naismith award candidate went four for four from the field and four for five from the free-throw line for 12 points.

Ohlde also pulled down three rebounds and blocked one shot, as K-State took a 41-19 halftime lead.

K-State's centerpiece would notch 13 more points in the second half along with four more boards, as the Wildcats avenged last year's loss in Lincoln with an 88-54 victory over the Cornhuskers.

The Wildcats' 17th win of the season marked Ohlde's sixth 20-plus point total of the season and 29th of her career.

Coach Deb Patterson said consistency, coupled with a slew of other recognizable assets, is something K-State has come to expect from Ohlde.

"Nicole Ohlde is an absolutely dominant presence in this game," Patterson said. "And I don't mean in the Nebraska game, I mean in the women's game. She is reliable, she is consistent, and she is willing to take on two and three defenders on a catch.

"She takes on a lot of contact, but she is incredibly tough and is a tremendous competitor."

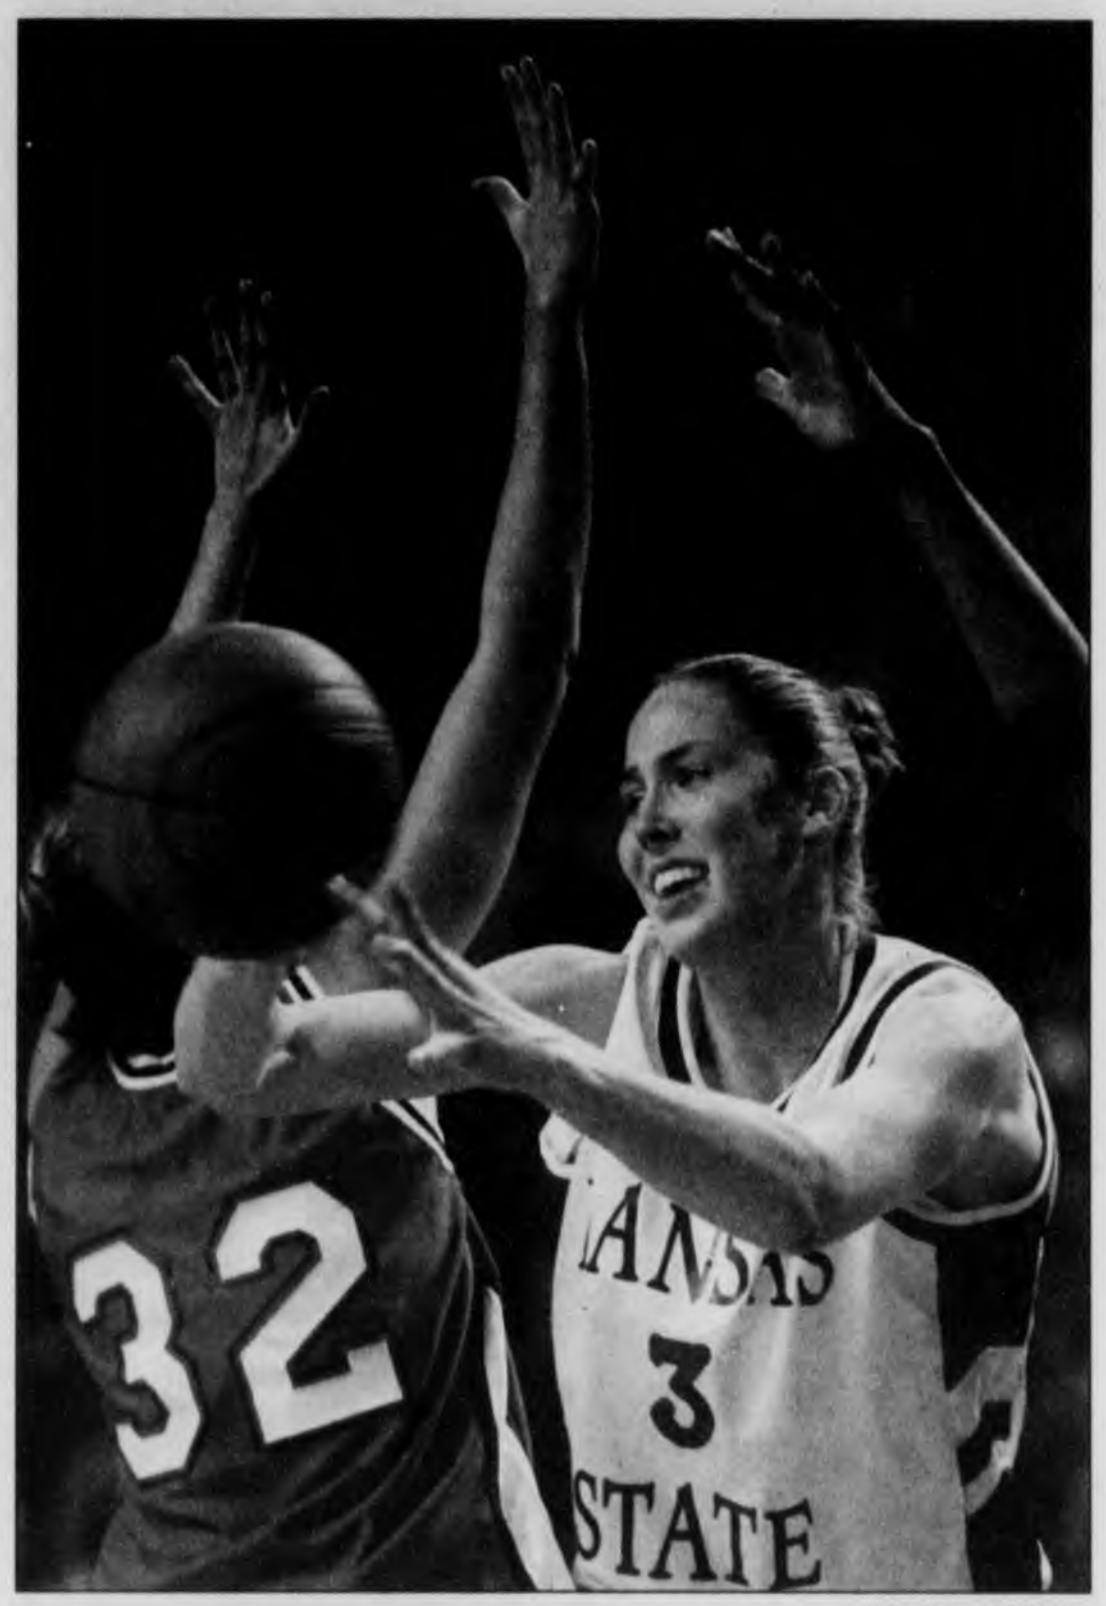
Ohlde, the competitor, is someone opponents have been having fits with all season long.

Ohlde, who was named Big 12 Player of the Week on Dec. 2, has eight double-doubles on the year.

The junior ranks fourth in the Big 12 in scoring at 17.9 points per game, ninth in rebounding, second in blocked shots, and at No. 12 in the conference with 65 assists, is the league's only center to rank in the top 15 in the category.

But as good as she has been for K-State this year, Ohlde said there still is room for improvement.

"Things are coming along with attacking the basket more, but there are so many things I need to improve on," Ohlde said. "I need to be more aggressive going to the basket.



"I need to be strong and physical and keep working on rebounding and defense."

Consistency

Junior Nicole Ohlde has already garnered national attention as the Wildcats' go-to player. Her improvement through three years with the Cats shows why:

Rowers look forward to new facility

By David Skretta
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Past the glitz of the Bramlage Coliseum hardwood and beyond the glamour of Wagner Field lie the placid waters of Tuttle Creek Reservoir.

Home to the K-State women's varsity and men's club rowing programs, when turning onto Victory Drive north of Manhattan, sights settle upon an aging cement boat garage built in the 1960's, lacking locker and restroom facilities, team rooms, and modern amenities indicative of a major collegiate rowing program.

This presents uncomfortable situations for rowers, junior coxswain Elane Walker said.

"A lot of the time we get off the water and go to class without showers or even being able to dry off," Walker said.

In an era where superior facilities attract and cultivate great athletes, Wildcat women's coach Jenny Hale began a quest nearly five years ago to build a structure that would serve the purpose of rowers for years to come.

What the K-State rowing programs needed was a home.

Others saw the need as well, and Hale found herself lofty support. Among the major supporters of K-State rowing is Ruth Ann Wefald, wife of university president Jon Wefald.

"I sat down with Mrs. Wefald some years ago, and we put our heads together," Hale said. "We needed an action committee that addressed our specific needs as a program. We put together a group of people to set out a long term goal of having a new facility.

"What it has kind of grown into is not just a committee that supports women's rowing, but actually supports all rowing that goes on at K-State."

That includes the Kansas State Rowing Association. KSRA, consisting of the men's club rowing team, as well as the junior boys and girls programs, will also benefit from the new boathouse.

The $1.1 million dollar project, set to break ground April 19, will include a third bay for boats, locker rooms and shower facilities, training rooms, meeting rooms, and on-site offices.

The goal is to bring the facility up to par with the quality of a burgeoning program that saw unprecedented levels of success last season. Hale said it also yields the possibility of bringing a large scale event to Manhattan.

Much of the funding for the boathouse has been raised through private donations, including a $500,000 lead gift in August by George Breidenthal of Kansas City, Kan.

"George Breidenthal was a manager for the rowing program in its infancy in the 1960's, and he has a very strong relationship with K-State and K-State athletics," Hale said. "He's been extremely generous with women's basketball and now rowing.

"He came out, toured the facilities, and we talked about what we needed. He's one of those guys, you tell him what you need and he goes after it. He's just a really good K-Stater."

Numerous fund-raisers have also helped support the project, including a joint effort with Habitat for Humanity aptly named "Row for Humanity."

"They don't have a shortage of people who want to pound nails," Hale said, explaining the partnership. "What they do have is a shortage of money. We've taken a fund-raiser and taken two really great programs and joined efforts to build houses for Habitat, and in our case, help the rowing programs."

It just so happens that the rowing programs will soon be building a new house of their own.

"We're pumped," said Walker. "We're looking forward to having the boathouse finished to use next year."

Contributions

- George Breidenthal's $500,000 gift to the KSU Foundation will be applied to a fund to be used for a new boathouse for the K-State rowing program. The $1.1 million project is scheduled to break ground April 19.

Women's win highlights busy sports weekend

By Dan Smith
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Three K-State teams spent a busy holiday weekend competing against Big 12 opponents.

The Wildcat men's basketball team got the weekend off to a tough start with a loss in Lawrence on Saturday, but K-State's women bounced back to blow out Nebraska on Sunday to tie the program's best start in school history.

Nicole Ohlde's 19th career 20-plus point game sparked No. 4 K-State to an 88-54 win that avenged the Cats' subpar effort in Lincoln a year ago.

K-State forced 20 Nebraska turnovers during the contest and held the Huskers scoreless over the first half's final 6:39 to build a 41-19 lead at the intermission.

Ohlde's 23 points led all scorers, and the Wildcats led by as many as 42 in posting the team's largest margin of victory in the series' history.

"Before the game, we talked about how poorly we played when we came up here a year ago," Coach Deb Patterson said. "We addressed it, and it was just great to finally experience success here."

Four K-State players finished with double-digit point totals, as the Wildcats earned a win on Nebraska's home floor for the first time since Jan. 6, 1995.

A day earlier, No. 12 Kansas eased past the Wildcat men, 81-64, to extend their winning streak over K-State to 25 games.

The Jayhawks opened the game on a 15-0 run and stayed hot with a 50-percent scoring rate to keep the lead in double digits for much of the night.

During KU's hot start, the Wildcats missed five shots, committed four fouls and turned the ball over four times.

"The beginning of the game was really our downfall. You can't spot a team like KU on their home floor with a 15 point lead," Coach Jim Wooldridge said.

Things did get better for the Cats, though. Gilson DeJesus' 4-of-8 effort from behind the 3-point arc pulled K-State within reach several times, and the Cats lost the rebounding edge by only Dorothy once said, "there's no place like home."

I beg to differ.

K-State's women's basketball road games have felt like home this season.

Kendra Wecker entertained a purple-clad audience Sunday about an hour north of her Marysville, Kan., home.

Two weeks ago I visited a similar atmosphere in Lawrence. Allen Fieldhouse was packed with purple.

The crowd that night wasn't there to root on the Hawks. Rather, they came to see the Jayhawks demise on their precious floor.

I arrived at Allen with some friends about two hours before tip-off, and while walking up, I felt like I was back in Manhattan as I was surrounded by purple all the way to the door. It was difficult to remember that I was in enemy territory. When I got to the doors and saw the first crimson and blue of the evening, I almost turned around. I didn't know if I would be able to enter without becoming ill.

After entering the den of the infidel, I thought, "so this is where Larry Brown won a national championship with a corrupt program back in '88?"

As gametime approached, the stands filled with purple.

Soon, "Wildcat Victory" was drowning out the Rock Chalk chants within Allen on a trumpet being played by Rick Williams. You might remember him from the 2002 K-State-Mizzou football game. Yes, he

John Lucas was fired Monday as coach of the Cleveland Cavaliers, who have the NBA's worst record and have shown few signs of development this season.

NFL | Shockey fined for throwing ice

Giants rookie Jeremy Shockey was fined $10,000 for throwing a cup of ice into the stands and making an obscene gesture during a first-round playoff loss at San Francisco.

The NFL docked the All-Pro tight end $5,000 for each act, league spokesman Greg Aiello said Monday.

Shockey, a rookie who also made the Pro Bowl, threw the cup over his shoulder in the first quarter while being heckled by fans after he complained about the officiating.

College Basketball | New polls released

Arizona took advantage of Duke's poor Saturday and seized the top spot in the latest USA Today/ESPN coaches' poll released Monday night.

Arizona (13-1)posted conference wins over long-time rivals Southern California and UCLA and received 30 first-place votes and 774 points from a panel of Division I coaches.

UConn, which was No. 1 all last season, moved up to second in the women's poll on Monday after setting an NCAA record with its 55th straight victory. Duke remained the overwhelming choice for No. 1.

Duke received 41 of 44 first-place votes from a national media panel and had 1,097 points after beating Georgia Tech and Wake Forest last week. The Blue Devils then survived a close call Monday, beating No. 9 North Carolina 78-67 in overtime.

Lindsey Bauman | COLLEGIAN

K-State's Nicole Ohlde takes a shot against Shahidrah Roberts of Nebraska during their 88-54 win against the Cornhuskers in Lincoln on Sunday. Ohlde contributed a game-high 23 points to the win extending K-State's winning streak to 12 games.

"We're all comfortable," she said. "We were all here last year and everybody has a good feel for what we're supposed to be doing. We're executing and getting into our offense quickly, and that's why we've been successful.

"The easy looks I get during a game happen because everybody else is doing their job."

Still, getting the job done has become a trademark of Ohlde while at K-State. As she continues to improve, the junior is closing in on a distinct honor in the Big 12 conference – and in women's college basketball.

Only two players in the history of the Big 12 – 2002 OU-grad Stacey Dales-Schuman and Texas legend Edwina Brown – have accumulated 1,600 points, 700 rebounds, 200 assists, and 200 steals in their careers.

Ohlde is 222 points, 72 rebounds and 91 steals shy of joining the group.

Patterson said Ohlde's determination to taste victory is what may allow the center to share the exclusive honor.

"She wants to win," she said. "And that inspires her effort to such great heights."

DOMINATE | Women's basketball overtake K-State rivals: KU, Nebraska

was the guy that had the Missouri Highway Patrol searching desperately for most of the second half for the menace to society that decided to support the Cats by playing his trumpet on the road.

Trumpeters aside, K-State's women went on to drill KU by 39.

This weekend, the women were on the road in another town despised by purple people, Lincoln, Neb.

Let's face it, we love to see K-State beat Nebraska and KU.

It doesn't matter the sport; it is just plain enjoyable. And the women have been delivering some mighty blows to those two institutions during the last two years.

Like the football team that handed KU, Iowa State, and Nebraska their worst losses in series history, Coach Deb Patterson's gals this season have handed KU and Nebraska the same. K-State's 88-49 win in Lawrence was the Cats largest margin of victory over KU in school history.

It was the same song Sunday. K-State's 34-point win not only represented the largest margin of victory in its series with Nebraska, but it also wiped out a seven-year Wildcat losing streak in games played at the Devaney Center.

Estimates had at least 40 percent of Sunday's crowd wearing purple as the Cats rolled to Patterson's first win in Lincoln.

It's plain amazing the support K-State's women have garnered during the last two seasons.

If you would have told anyone three years ago that K-State's women would be outdrawing Big 12 teams in their home arenas, even they probably wouldn't have believed you.

The Wildcats have now done it in consecutive Big 12 road games, making it hard to believe the Cats have played two of their last three on the road.

On Saturday, the Cats will really be at home when they square off against a ranked Texas team before a nationally televised audience.

It's too bad fans in Austin won't get the same show fans in Lawrence and Lincoln were treated to.

three boards, 40-37.

KU senior Kirk Hinrich led all scorers with 26 points, Nick Collison added 16 and Keith Langford had 14 for the Jayhawks, who also pushed their conference winning streak to 23.

The Nebraska women's indoor track and field team impressed at Ahearn Field House.

Shelly-Ann Brown took the 60-meter dash and 60-meter hurdles to lead the Huskers to the team victory at the Wildcat Invitational.

Rebekah Green was K-State's top competitor at the event. The junior set new school and meet records in the shot put, with a 56-foot, 8-inch throw.

Nebraska won 10 of 17 events at the event, which lasted from Friday to Sunday.

Amy Mortimer raced to a win in the 800 meters, finishing six seconds faster than the field at 2:13.58.

Administration considers North Korea global threat

By William Mann
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON – The Bush administration on Sunday portrayed the escalation of North Korea's nuclear activities as an international threat rather than a standoff only with the United States and signaled its intention to take the dispute to the U.N. Security Council.

Secretary of State Colin Powell met in New York with Foreign Ministers Tang Jiaxuan of China and Dominique de Villepin of France and they agreed that North Korea's resumption of a nuclear weapons program and its decision to quit the 1968 Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty posed an international problem, State Department spokesman Richard Boucher said.

The United States intends to bring the North Korean issue to the U.N. Security Council, a senior U.S. official, speaking on condition of anonymity, said.

The Council could deepen North Korea's economic problems with international sanctions.

President Bush's military and foreign policy advisers also took up the subject on Sunday morning talk shows.

In South Korea, the U.S. ambassador said efforts by the North to build nuclear weapons amounted to "a challenge to the entire international system."

China's ambassador to the United States said his government, is opposed to any nuclear weapons on the Korean Peninsula.

North Korea has ejected inspectors of the International Atomic Energy Agency and announced its withdrawal from the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty. It has moved to restart a reactor frozen by an agreement with the Clinton administration and rejected an offer by China to sponsor talks.

"Our approach has been not to allow North Korea to make this a crisis between the United States and North Korea," the president's national security adviser, Condoleezza Rice, told NBC.

"There is leverage here," she said. "This is a problem for all concerned countries, particularly in the region."

Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld said North Korea was "the world's biggest proliferator of ballistic missiles."

Powell disagrees with Bush on university affirmative action case

By Scott Lindlaw
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON – Secretary of State Colin Powell said Sunday he disagrees with President Bush's position on an affirmative action case before the Supreme Court, as the White House called for more money for historically black colleges.

Powell, one of two black members of Bush's Cabinet, said he supports methods the University of Michigan uses to bolster minority enrollments in its undergraduate and law school programs. The policies offer points to minority applicants and set goals for minority admissions.

"Whereas I have expressed my support for the policies used by the University of Michigan, the president, in looking at it, came to the conclusion that it was constitutionally flawed based on the legal advice he received," Powell said on the CBS program "Face the Nation."

'Justified' proves worthwhile

"JUSTIFIED"

Album review by Matthew Webber

Although it's tearin' up my heart to write this, I love the new Justin Timberlake album, "Justified."

Since critics are expected to criticize today's "Totally Hits," I feel like a sellout for justifying an erstwhile *NSync member's unabashed attempt to cut his puppet strings. Clearly, "Justified" is Timberlake's vision of what serious, grown-up pop music sounds like, which means the album sounds like the frivolous, adolescent poppycock of similar not-a-marrionette-not-yet-a-musician pop stars.

Here's the scorecard if you're playing at home: Today's hot producers? Check. R & B flava? Got it. Emotionally expressive but vague lyrics about love and its messy fallout? Yup.

But as Timberlake himself says in "Like I Love You" – the best Michael Jackson song since "Billie Jean" – "Sometimes people just destined, destined to do what they do... Now everybody dance." And you will dance, because Timberlake was destined to make music like this. Unlike many of his boy band peers, Timberlake has real charisma, pop sensibility and yes, musical talent, so "Justified" sounds like something an adult would want to listen to.

This I promise you: the songs on "Justified" are more innovative than almost anything else you will hear on mainstream radio. As ubiquitous as producers the Neptunes and Timbaland have been in the past few years, they somehow were able to save some of their all-time dopest beats for this former Mouseketeer.

Timberlake shakes his rump and gets his freak on. He works it, and it sounds hella good. Also, unlike most mainstream hits, Timberlake's songs are fun and sometimes funny.

Listen to the boys vs. girls singalong in "Senorita" or his inspirational gobbledygook at the end of "Like I Love You."

What is most surprising about the album is not how fresh or contemporary it sounds, but rather how credible it is as an R & B project. Most white people don't even perform white music as convincingly as Timberlake performs black music. Granted, Timberlake will never sing as soulfully as Marvin Gaye, Prince or Aretha Franklin, but then again, neither will B2K or Ashanti.

Of course, Timberlake's voice and image most closely resemble one of his idols, Michael Jackson, 2002's King of Flop. Like Jackson's "Off the Wall," Timberlake's solo debut is a declaration of independence from his teenybopper past. "Justified" is several more hit singles and a chimp away from being this generation's "Thriller."

Because of his high profile breakup with Britney Spears and his stalker-esque "Cry Me a River" video, Timberlake's personal life has overshadowed his music.

As coy as Timberlake can be regarding Britney in his interviews, I bet she thinks these songs are about her, and I bet she's right. Like any great artist, Timberlake (who cowrote every song) has turned his pain into our pleasure.

Character development, action scenes make sequel worth seeing

"LORD OF THE RINGS: THE TWO TOWERS"

Movie review by Stacy Gettings

Despite a three-hour commitment, "Lord of the Rings: The Two Towers," the second installment in the fantasy trilogy, is an excellent choice for just about everyone.

This installment of the trilogy dives deeper into the art of character development while also introducing new personalities. King Theoden of Rohan (Bernard Hill) is introduced as feeble and controlled by his greasy, slithering advisor Grima Wormtongue (Brad Dourif). Once the newly reborn Gandalf (Ian McKellen) sees Theoden's condition, we find that the king has been bewitched by the evil wizard Saruman (Christopher Lee). Thanks to Gandalf's power, Theoden is released from Saruman's control. In the process, we are introduced to the true Theoden, a powerful, caring king that was formerly suppressed by dark powers.

Another character that is very worthy of mentioning is Theoden's niece, Eowyn (Miranda Otto). She is seen leading her uncle's people to safety, while burning with the desire to fight for her personal valor and her kingdom. She harbors an obvious attraction to Aragorn (Viggo Mortensen), whom we see having a personal conflict of his own. Her personality is well portrayed as deep, though her depth is covered by a layer of ice.

Perhaps the best character to watch is Gollum (Andy Serkis), a victim of the ring's power. He is only hinted at in the "Fellowship of the Ring," but appears abundantly in "The Two Towers." His personality has been split between good and evil as a consequence of being in possession of the ring. He catches up with Frodo (Elijah Wood) and Sam (Sean Astin) on the verges of Mordor, driven to follow them by his desire. Once in reach of the ring, his two personalities are given a voice.

Another good reason to check out this movie is to see the amazing visual beauty Middle Earth offers. The scenery seems to be blessed with the light of the Valar. There are aerial shots of snow-covered peaks, lush grassy plains and thick canopied forests.

The movie's intense action along with its scenic beauty are unique in today's movie industry. The highlight of the action comes with the battle at Helm's Deep where 10,000 orcs charge Rohan's army.

Axes, arrows and even a menacing use of Saruman's magic make for a captivating action scene.

This film is one that the lovers of action and beauty will enjoy.

Book takes a deeper look at Middle Earth

"LORD OF THE RINGS: THE TWO TOWERS"

Book review by Katie Lane

The book "Lord of the Rings: The Two Towers" does a great job of providing an in-depth look at Middle Earth and the stories of Middle Earth.

While the movie offers a visual look into the characters of Middle Earth, it lacks the detail the book offers.

J.R.R Tolkien's description of the landscape of Middle Earth provides a much deeper look into the history of the land.

The movie can allot only so much time to the background of the land and the events that occurred long ago, but the book completely satisfies any questions about the history of Middle Earth.

Not only does the book give more description of the land, but it also delves into the lives of the characters and flushes out their personalities.

Tolkien's descriptions of hobbit life make the movie's depiction seem shallow. Frodo's life and adventures are covered more thoroughly by Tolkien. However, taking into account the already lengthy film, it is easy to understand how the movie could leave out some of Frodo's adventures.

Peter Jackson does a decent job of keeping true to Tolkien's words, but there are some variations from the book.

For instance, it might be easy to assume that Bilbo Baggins is Frodo's grandfather or great uncle, however this isn't the case.

The book describes how Frodo was adopted by Bilbo and the ensuing consequences of the adoption.

Jackson's effort to make a movie that was entertaining as well as loyal to what Tolkien wrote wasn't altogether impressive in some instances.

Tolkien's organization of the different storylines was original and created the kind of suspense that the movie lacked.

Jackson avoided the structure of the book and instead chose the common approach of the storylines jumping back and forth. The entertainment value of a fast moving storyline is probably the reason Jackson chose that particular structure, but there is some value in Tolkien's choice of organization.

The eye-catching visuals from the movie were added with the purpose of appealing to the masses, but the book took a great deal more time expanding on the lives and history of Middle Earth.

It is for this reason that the book is a better form of entertainment than any eye candy the movie might provide.

Manhattan Bridal Show greets couples in Union

More than 20 vendors participate in show, provide wedding planning guidance for engaged students

By Stephani Edington
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Some future newlyweds received wedding gifts a little early on Sunday.

Prizes totaling more than $2,000, including a DVD player, a television and a $1,000 wedding gift certificate package, as well as many more smaller gift certificates, were given away at the 33rd-annual Manhattan Bridal Show at the K-State Student Union Ballroom.

With the cooperation of more than 20 vendors, some who have been with the show since its debut in 1971, a year's worth of work finally paid off.

"What makes our show better than some is the professional class. Others look like trade shows. Ours looks like a presentation, and it is," said Ben Bennett, president of Manhattan Bridal Show Inc.

Manhattan Bridal Show is a non-profit organization. The members meet monthly to set up and plan the entire show. Only one member is allowed for each aspect of the wedding, meaning only one business offers cakes or wedding gowns, and some vendors, like Campbell's China and Fine Gifts, have been with the show all 33 years.

"We always put an emphasis on local merchants that are independent retailers," Betty Campbell, owner of Campbell's, said. "I can't think of anyone here who is part of a chain."

Vendors who are already members have the right to refuse to let someone in direct competition with them join the organization, Bennett said.

"We have people who are upset because we don't let them come in," he said. "All the people who are involved have been in business in Manhattan for a long time. They are community leaders and community people. Not only are they in business to be in business, they are in business to be involved and to give something back to the community and to K-State."

The vendors don't just plan and put on the show – they also pay for it, Bennett said.

"This is financed by those that are involved. The businesses pay membership dues, which are, in turn, used to pay for publicity," he said. "Everything taken in is redistributed in gifts and prizes. The only profit these businesses make is by soliciting their business to brides and grooms."

Everything to do with wedding planning, from distressing yourself during the actual planning to lingerie and swimwear for the honeymoon, was included in the show.

"We have always tried to cover all the areas for weddings and planning," Campbell said.

Alan Park, co-owner of Borck Brothers Mens Wear and long time member of Bridal Show, said he also likes how the show is set up.

"It's a nice show because you can come as a bride and groom and see all the aspects in one setting," Park said.

The show gets better every year, Campbell said.

"It's so much different than when we started out. It has improved and become much larger. The attendance has grown each year," she said. "I feel like this year we've done a really good job."

"The one consistency is that there are no two weddings that are exactly alike," said Jan Miller, owner of Steve's Floral. "Everyone has a budget, be it small or large."

It's the job of any vendor to provide them with what they want, within that budget, she said.

The businesses involved also have an obligation to each other.

They help each other out by recommending other affiliates, Bennett said.

A fashion show and wedding cake provided by Vern's cakes concluded the event. The fashion show featured the latest styles of tuxedos, wedding and bridesmaids gowns, swimwear, lingerie, and of course, the prizes.

Megan McElroy, graduate student in speech pathology, and Brett Clark, K-State graduate, engaged since May 20, 2002, attended the fair to assist in planning for their Aug. 9, 2003, wedding. They've already discovered the difficulties that accompany wedding preparations.

"The hardest part of planning a wedding is trying to budget everything," Clark said.

Drew Rose | COLLEGIAN
Kimberly Platt, junior in accounting, and her mother, Brenda Platt, discuss with Alan Parker of Borck Bros. Mens Wear which tuxedo would look nice in her wedding. The bridal fair allowed men and women to get ideas for planning their weddings.

KING | Students join to remember leader's legacy

"For him to come to Kansas State University means so much to me personally because I go to Bethel AME and Rev. Finney loves his church and its members."

Rossiter said he and other members of the Alpha Phi Alpha fraternity will be raising money all this week in the K-State Student Union for a Washington memorial to King. The fraternity is asking those willing to donate $1 to the national effort to construct the memorial. An artist's conception of the monument will be on display with the fraternity members in the Union this week.

Rossiter said it is important for people to remember King's message every day of the year, not just the day given to his memory.

"It's important to pay our respects to King, but it's more important to pay our respects to what he stood for, and remember his dream every day," he said.

TARGET | Store to provide competition, more shoppers

Target had applied for a store location in Manhattan, the Seth Child and Fort Riley intersection was appropriate for commercial development.

Although Target will add to the competing discount market, Wal-Mart store owner Roy Hulett said he isn't sure what to expect when Target opens.

"We've never had one before, so I really don't know," he said.

While discount stores will wait to see the results of Target's arrival, smaller discount stores around Manhattan have been used to the competition.

Charlie Hong, owner of Hotline Gifts in the Manhattan Town Center, said that he is not afraid of Target.

Hong said he believes the opening of a Target store will bring more people into Manhattan, thus creating more business for small retailers.

In addition, he said Target will provide competition in Manhattan and hopefully cause prices to drop.

Along with an increase in shopping variety, the Manhattan Target store will also hire approximately 200 to 250 employees, ranging from entry-level team members to salaried executives, said Mary Seamon, clerical team leader for the Overland Park Target.

by the Occupational Health Department are minor work related injuries, such as muscle strains and carpal tunnel syndrome. The department also deals with non-injury related services

"Moving well people out of a place where ill people come is good for everyone involved," Schlageck said.

Last spring, a Sunset Fitness Center survey showed that 70 percent of its members said additional space and equipment was their chief concern.

Fitness center member Tony Rock said that during peak hours, members often have to wait in line to use the equipment.

The new site will house 2,476 square feet of cardio and free weight equipment, three times more than the area currently occupied at Sunset.

The weight area will feature all new equipment, and the machines from the Sunset location will be moved to the Eastside Fitness Center, which will remain in operation at 455 East Poyntz.

The cardio area will have additional treadmills and elliptical machines, which are among the most heavily used pieces of equipment.

Barbie Anderson, fitness and wellness coordinator, said the member survey also expressed a need for child care services and larger locker rooms with showers.

Both will be available when the center relocates.

"We pretty much designed this facility based on the results of the survey," Anderson said, "What they said they wanted is what we put in."

While Rock said he is excited to use the new facility, he is slightly concerned with the availability of parking spaces in the Town West shopping center.

To address such concerns, Mercy has made plans to expand the current parking lot as well as rent spots from neighboring businesses.

WINTER | Attention, extra time may prevent accidents leads to more accidents, which means drivers should take extra precaution when driving.

"Pay attention to driving conditions and allow extra time to get there to allow safety," he said.

For extra precaution, Holeman said it was advisable to obtain a copy of the police report to turn into the insurance agency.

Although many drivers make settlements, he said drivers should not accept money from the other party involved in the accident.

"Don't take money on the scene of the accident," Holeman said.

"You could forfeit your right with the insurance company."

Teen girl hospitalized

Teenager taken to Mercy for alcohol poisoning after party

By Stephani Edington
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A 17-year-old girl was hospitalized Sunday for alcohol poisoning after attending a party at Lambda Chi Alpha fraternity.

Katherine Butkus, of Overland Park, Kan., was taken to Mercy Health Center, where she was placed in the intensive care unit at about 9 p.m.

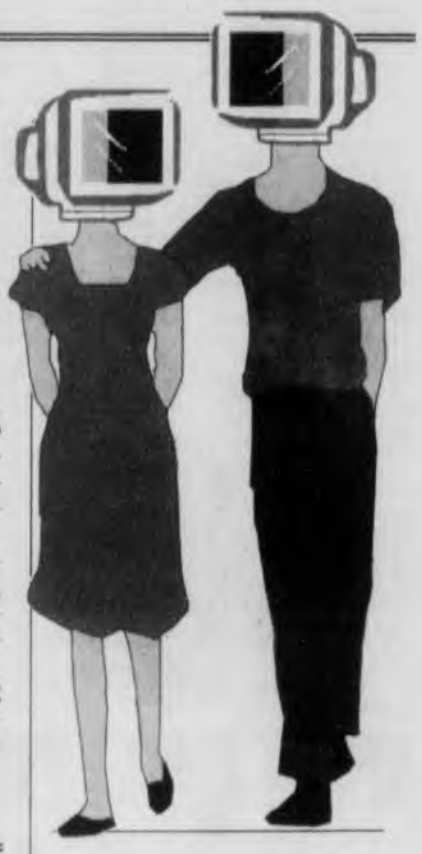
Her exact blood alcohol level was not released, but Lt. Kurt Moldrup of the Riley County Police Department said it was over 0.2.

Butkus and an 18-year-old female from Shawnee, Kan., were visiting a friend in Manhattan.

Butkus had reportedly attended a party at the fraternity with the two friends earlier in the evening.

The party was reported to have been organized for the purpose of a drinking game, Moldrup said.

"Butkus voluntarily engaged in the drinking game, eventually becoming so intoxicated that she was fading in and out of consciousness," Moldrup said.



April Hamilton, community relations and planning coordinator at Mercy Regional Health Center, said Butkus was treated and released from Mercy Health Center.

Greek Affairs and K-State Police were notified, as well as the National Chapter of Lambda Chi Alpha Fraternity.

Greek Affairs Adviser Barb Robel said the situation is being investigated, but the organization didn't make any other comments.

Charges pending investigation are endangering a child, contributing to a child's misconduct and furnishing intoxicants to a minor.

Any reports determining responsibility will be forwarded to the city attorney for sentencing.

Council discusses Wal-Mart

Commissioners revist Wal-Mart Superstore issue

By Rogie Dorpinghaus
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

City Commissioner Bruce Snead said he was happy to support the Wal-Mart issue at the Manhattan City Commission meeting on Tuesday night.

"We've been working with Wal-Mart for a long time," Snead said.

"With the traffic challenges and land challenges, it takes time to get it right. This week all of the issues have meshed together and we're ready to move forward."

At the meeting, commissioners approved another step necessary for Manhattan to house a Super Wal-Mart, which desires occupancy by October.

The cost of correcting future traffic challenges will be split three ways. Wal-Mart will pay 50 percent, and Manhattan and Pottawatomie County will each pay 25 percent.

"There aren't too many businesses that will tax themselves $4 million to make improvements in order to do business here," Rich Seidler, city commissioner, said.

The land on which Wal-Mart will be located was formerly owned by the city and used for storm water retention.

To receive the land, Wal-Mart paid the full-appraised value of $1.15 million, and the store must relocate the city's 36-inch interceptor sewer at its own cost.

City Commission

Discussion items at Tuesday's meeting:
- Wal-Mart Development Agreement approved
- Wal-Mart's petition to create a Transportation Development District approved
- Public hearing date for Wal-Mart store set for Feb. 4
- Engineering Services Agreement approved for Wal-Mart project

We should embrace Martin Luther King Jr.'s vision of peace, justice, reconciliation and equality, Danny Glover said Tuesday night during a presentation honoring the civil rights leader and poet Langston Hughes.

Actors Glover and Felix Justice presented their two-man theatrical presentation, "A Night With Martin Luther King and Langston Hughes," in McCain Auditorium as a part of Martin Luther King Jr. Observance Week.

Justice recited the last speech given by King, which included talks about Medgar Evers, Malcolm X, starving children and the Vietnam War.

"I think of the children in the world: Africa, Vietnam and China. Little children, starving," Justice quoted King.

Black poet Hughes was honored by Glover, who read several of Hughes' works including "Hope for Harlem," "Weary Blues" and "Dream Variation."

To get in touch with a Hughes poem, a person must realize its relationship to the poet's past, Glover said, just as he does with the poem "Aunt Sue."

"To know a poet, you need to understand the legacy," he said.

"When reading the poem, it reminds me of my own past."

A question-and-answer session was held after the presentation. Students, faculty and community members asked the speakers about their thoughts on racial, political and personal issues, including Trent Lott's earlier comments on Strom Thurmond's 1948 segregationalist presidential platform.

"That was not a slip of the tongue," Justice said.

Justice also said he thought racial reparations would be much more therapeutic for the givers than for the receivers.

When asked about why the two travel together performing the show, Justice answered, praising Glover's work.

"I've long admired Danny's civic sense and how he has given himself to any community he's been in," Justice said. "Twelve years we've been on the road doing this, and I admire his talent, civic-mindedness and concern with people."

Justice also said he thought the night

In Levi's blue jeans and a black sweater, Danny Glover sat in his dressing room, autographing posters and speaking about what he called a "general trend of human rights violations" throughout the 1960s to the present day. Felix Justice, sitting neatly in a navy blue suit with matching tie and socks, nodded as he listened to his friend of 30 years.

Glover and Justice came to K-State Tuesday night to enlighten students, faculty, staff and community members on words from past leaders in their presentation, "A Night with Martin Luther King Jr. and Langston Hughes."

Although their presentation included visions of past leaders speaking out for human and civil rights, Justice and Glover said there are still too many violations going on today.

"There is far too much of it – of human rights violations – no matter if it's more now than then," Justice said, shaking his head.

Glover mentioned the struggles of all types of groups of people, from indigenous peoples to those in the Catholic Church who were silenced in their efforts to gain human rights for others.

Glover added that he was dismayed by the lack of discussion about the detainment of Arab-Americans.

"It almost goes over our head – we just accept it," he said. "That's the tragedy. Can you imagine where King would be with that? He'd be all over that."

Prizes offered for slogan

Aggieville seeks new advertising

By Crystal Becker
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Students in a money pinch have until Friday to use their creative juices to earn more than $700 in prizes.

The Aggieville Business Association is sponsoring a slogan-writing contest to promote business in Aggieville.

Cheryl Sieben, director of the Aggieville Business Association, said the slogan will be used in future advertising and will represent all businesses in the district.

"We're trying to find a unifying tag line or slogan that is approximately 10 words or less that will let people know about the shopping experience in Aggieville," Sieben said.

"We have everything from services to retail to gyms. We're trying to get a tag line that will focus on everything."

Sieben said the winner will receive a $300 gift certificate

BANTER AND BELLOW

Pet peeves about K-State, Manhattan include tacky chalkings, hick image

LAYTON:

Well, since I don't hate the Alumni Center anymore and have realized it is a great source of perpetual and supreme power, my pet peeve would have to be thoughtless and poorly written sidewalk chalkings.

It usually looks like the chalkers were either chalkin' it up in complete darkness, or they were chalking without the use of their hands. I don't buy the excuse, "It's hard to write big" either. I don't want someone who says that to be in my group projects toward the end of the year.

Listen, if you spell something wrong like the words "tonight" or "public," it's doubtful people will show up to your event. I thought it was common knowledge that the more effort you put into an advert, the more people will respond to it on the fly.

Put some damn thought into your chalkings. How about a riddle on the way to class? Just chalk a simple riddle and tag it with the proper time, place and whatever attribution of the event you've got brewing. Best of luck.

Here's a couple more of my pet peeves to munch: I hate how being in Kedzie Hall for too long makes people smell like Boss Hog. It's just a building that doesn't breathe as much as I'd like it to. There ain't nothin' like Kedzie's scrant stench.

What about how the campus squirrels always look like they're up to something terrible? I figure they'd be dipping into the meth market. Look into their eyes. Look! Without breaking a sweat, tell me you would trust a K-State squirrel with your life.

Yeah, that's what I thought.

Question

The semester's getting started. What pet peeves do you have about K-State?

You can e-mail Banter and Bellow columnists Dana Strongin, junior in print journalism, and Layton Ehmke, senior in print journalism at banter@spub.ksu.edu

DANA:

K-State has its share of faults.

But before I start ranting, remember that, to me, this place is an oasis. I fled here, a battered refugee from another university in a state that's actually proud to be "like a whole other country."

Luckily, I'm back where the ladies don't feel compelled to wear dresses to class and most people aren't "fixin' to" do anything.

Recall that K-State is a land grant university. I am so sick of hearing ignorant people make assumptions about this school because of that.

Welcome to Kansas. Yes, K-State teaches farmers. We also have programs for millers and bakers. To some, this seems to mean we're hicks.

It takes more than a hick to run the grain industry, from stalk to slice. And if you eat any bread products, you should thank many people associated with this university.

But being tucked into the breadbasket of the nation isn't always the most exciting thing in the world. Sure, you can usually walk around town without fear of being jumped. People here are also pretty down to earth.

Yet I know I'm missing something. I could be off in a big city, one where Wendy's isn't the only eatery offering food items containing pita bread. A place where it would be fun to spend a Saturday afternoon on a park bench, just watching eclectic souls go about their days.

Despite the enormous challenges, here I will remain. Maybe I'll sit on a bench this weekend anyway. Or maybe I'll just eat some really great bread.

was positive.

"This evening was a success," Justice said. "As long as we keep engaging thoughtful young people, we're successful."

One student asked why Hughes was chosen to be honored in the lecture.

"Hughes is the most important African-American poet of the 20th century," Glover said.

Several students said they enjoyed the message Justice and Glover presented through the words of King and Hughes.

"I really liked Felix Justice," Michael Trenary, sophomore in English, said.

"Hearing the words of King through Justice was great. It really made me understand the struggle."

Robert McNair, director for GEAR UP II, said the lecture made him reminiscent about his childhood.

"It made me reflect on the things my grandmother taught me when I was a kid sitting on the front porch," McNair said. "Coming from the South, she passed on a lot to me."

The question-and-answer session also brought some debate, which one student found beneficial.

"I enjoyed the Q&A the best," said Natalie Rolfe, junior in mass communications and psychology.

"They were real with what they said. I think it enlightened people because some of them didn't expect the answers they got."

Following the event, a free showing of the movie "The Color Purple," starring Glover, was featured in Forum Hall.

GLOVER | Presentation relates past issues to current situations

Glover said that in carrying out King's vision, it was important not to confuse what King's message was.

"Do we really know what his 'beloved community' meant?" Glover asked, pulling his eyebrows down in the center.

"If King were here today, what would he think of the country spending so much on the military – facing moral bankruptcy?"

Justice and Glover said they hoped K-State students, or people in that age group, listened to the way King and Hughes wrote and thought.

"King was firmly grounded in his principles as a young man, and as he grew older, he began to apply those principles to his life," Justice said. "I would encourage students to become principled – act on your convictions. Don't just respond to the world."

Glover added that students should become effective, conscious citizens.

"More than anything, that certainly would be what Martin and Langston would want," he said.

As in King's speech that Justice reenacted, Justice said that he, too, would like to be remembered as a person who would like to serve others. Glover was in silent agreement.

to Varney's Book Store and $50 gift certificates to Gei Gei's, Haynes Style Shop and Beauty Supply, Mercado Gourmet Grocery, Shear Dynamics, The Palace Cards and Gifts and Zotcis Attire.

In addition, $20 in gift certificates to Krystallos, Inc. and Domino's Pizza and $100 in Aggieville Bucks, redeemable at any Aggieville business, will be given away.

Ester Wiechen, a manager of Zotcis Attire, said a unifying slogan is long overdue.

"Aggieville hasn't had any unifying slogan or advertising before," Wiechen said.

"We're hoping we'll be able to split the cost and still get the word out."

Sieben said the contest is open to everyone.

"People can submit more than one entry," she said. "If they have several ideas they can put them on the same sheet and list them."

As of Tuesday afternoon, Sieben said she had more than 40 entries. Entries will be accepted through Friday.

Sieben said the contest winner will be chosen Jan. 30 and announced in early February. The contest winner, Sieben said, will have to relinquish any rights to the slogan.

"If it's a good one, the sky's the limit for how long we can use it," she said.

TO THE POINT

Week offers opportunities to celebrate King's work

The day of remembrance for the late Martin Luther King Jr. has passed, yet the week in which Americans honor one of the most influential figures in history continues.

Throughout the week, K-State will offer a number of opportunities to pay respects to King – and it's important for students, faculty and Manhattan residents to get involved.

For an uplifting lunch-time break, students can attend the Interfaith Dialogue from noon to 1 p.m. today in the Union Courtyard or make reservations for the Fellowship Luncheon, which is scheduled from noon to 1:30 p.m., Friday in the Union Grand Ballroom.

After a week of classes, students and faculty can listen to Myra Gordon's lecture "Living Like a King" at 10:30 a.m. Friday in Forum Hall.

In addition to these scheduled events, K-State has also included a variety of activities lasting throughout the week.

During the week, students and faculty are encouraged to stop by the Union and donate money toward a monument commemorating King. The national monument will be erected in Washington.

Members of the Alpha Phi Alpha fraternity are asking students and faculty to donate money for the monument. Their goal is to receive $1 from each donor, and donations can be made in the Union for the rest of the week.

Through Friday, the College of Engineering complex will be displaying African American posters in the atrium. The exhibition is open to all interested students.

Members of the K-State community have worked hard and spent thousands of dollars creating opportunities for students to pay respect to King.

Moreover, these activities reach out to the entire university, giving the chance for students of all cultural and ethnic backgrounds to respect one another in a time where unity is essential.

The issue of K-State failing to reach out and offer more diversity in programming events arises often. Activities like these reach out to the needs of a diversity-seeking campus.

PSYCHO THERAPY

Dr. Phil's harsh lessons provide entertainment, inflated sense of self-worth despite constant criticism

PAUL RESTIVO

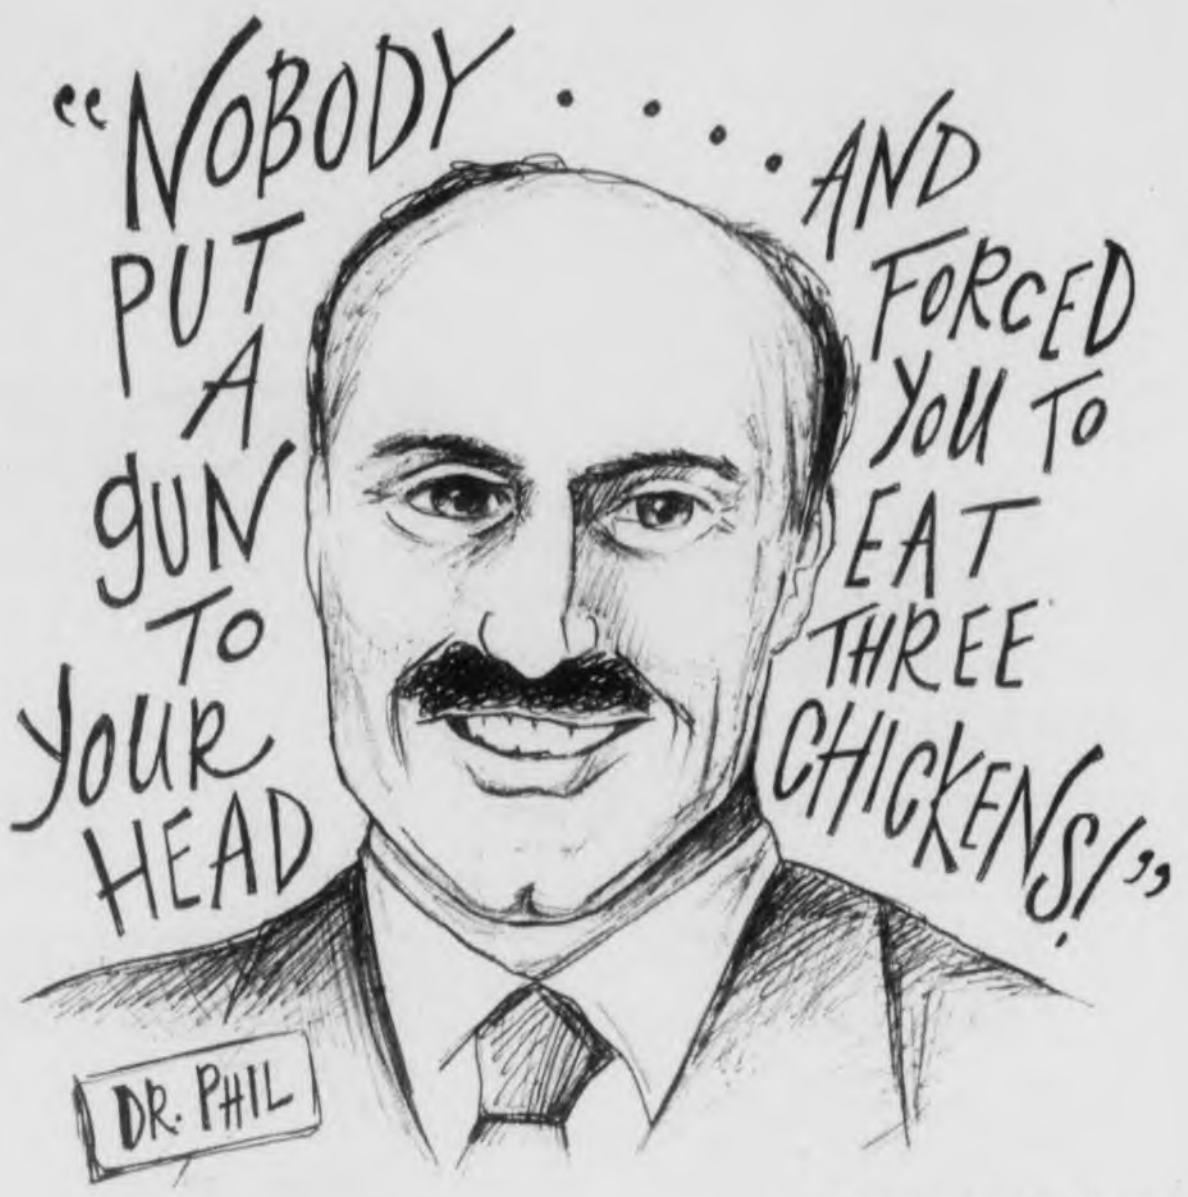

Illustration by Anna Wetzel | COLLEGIAN

As if there weren't enough people in my life telling me how much I suck, I now have Dr. Phil and his catalog of Phil-isms to reaffirm that belief.

Thanks to the extended weekend, I had a little time to sit down with Dr. Phil's show. The topic of discussion was how he thought Internet porn was the same as cheating on your woman. If this is the case, I guess my girlfriend and I are finished.

Nonetheless, I was intrigued by this hour-long celebration of Oprah propaganda. The former Oprah sidekick now has his own audience of sheep to lord over, but it's not the same. I sort of miss having Oprah at his side, as she would repeat the doctor's Phil-isms to confirm to herself and the audience that she was just so self-aware. Things like, "You don't have to rob a bank to shave a weasel," and "You don't need gonorrhea to fall in love with a butt hole."

But Oprah's lackey now has his own uncomfortable freak show of middle Americans, and audiences are digging it, which confirms my belief that the end of the world is on its way.

But what kept me watching this show is its ability to make me like myself a lot more by the time the credits are rolling. In fact, the episode about fat people had me in tears. And I didn't know if I was sad, happy, or angry. It might have been the Phil-ism that sticks with me to this day. While yelling at a 400-pound woman, Phil pats her on the leg and says, "Nobody put a gun to your head and forced you to eat three chickens."

It was after that comment that I realized I had grown to hate (but still write down) all Dr. Phil's nuggets of knowledge, or Phil-isms. I didn't necessarily like the comment he made to a couple saying, "You people need to move into your car," but it still meant something to me.

Now, quite a lot of people who go on his pimpstress Oprah's show to get mental advice are not actually people who would fall into the group who have mental illness. I don't think Dr. Phil uses "bad psychiatry," because I've rarely seen an episode where "Stop whining, you slutty housewife with a good life; you aren't manic or bipolar; you are just whiny and need to get a hobby" isn't the proper advice to give out.

Quack psychiatry would be putting those tossers on Oprah on actual mental drugs. The fact that he tells them there's nothing wrong with them and they should stop bitching is much better – I can think of loads of people who would've done better with that sort of advice than with being put on drugs (hello, Prozac Nation).

Personally, I don't watch talk shows for worthless self-help. I watch talk shows to watch white trash make fools of themselves for my entertainment. Dr. Phil, though, preys on the weak-minded in this country to make a living.

But thanks to Phil, I've tried my psycho-babble on a few friends. I've come up with my own Paul-isms such as "You don't need to go to school to touch yourself and giggle," or "You don't need Zsa Zsa Gabor to rock me like a hurricane." I laugh, but my friends give me the blank stare.

Regardless of Phil's career choice as Oprah's whore, I commend him on profiting from the Queen of Talk.

It just goes to show you that you don't need Oprah's permission to ramble like a boob.

Commercials claiming SUV drivers support terrorism narrow-minded

KATHRYN HOLLINGSWORTH

"I helped hijack an airplane."

"I gave money to a terrorist training camp in a foreign country."

"What if I need to go off-road?"

America has been uniting in the war against terrorism for too long. It's time to start pointing fingers and placing blame on someone.

Why not sports utility vehicle (SUV) drivers? They generally represent the middle to upper class – and blaming the evil wealth mongers for as much as possible leaves a self-righteous taste in the mouths of opinion leaders.

The anti-SUV advertising campaign was the brainchild of columnist Arianna Huffington. Labeled the "Detroit Project," it attacks Americans who drive gas-guzzling SUVs as supporters of terrorism. Huffington claims she hopes to reach drivers in Detroit and Congress with her message.

On Huffington's Web site, ariannaonline.com, she states that after viewing advertising campaigns launched by the Bush administration linking drug users and the financing of terrorism, she was angered. In retaliation, she chose to find what she claims is a more "credible" link to terrorism – SUV drivers.

Confronting consumers on her Web site and TV advertisements with statements such as "Oil supports some terrible things. What kind of gas mileage does your SUV get?" Huffington singles out a group of consumers to wreak vengeance.

They were an easy target for Huffington's narrow-minded campaign.

According to industryweek.com, two-thirds of the world's oil supply comes from the Middle East. When you couple this figure with the gas mileage a Ford Expedition gets –14 miles per gallon in the city and 18 miles per gallon on the highway – her argument seems infallible.

However, what if a consumer travels 15,000 miles a year in his or her SUV, and the owner of a compact car drives 150,000 miles a year? Isn't the SUV owner being more fuel-efficient?

Also, industryweek.com stated that the top two oil suppliers to the United States are Canada and Venezuela. So is filling up your SUV with gallons of gasoline putting guns into the hands of cold-blooded killers? There is definitely room for debate on this one.

There are SUV drivers who purchase them for their safety features, carrying capacities and off-road ability. However, there are consumers who purchase SUVs in metropolitan areas with no need for off-road capabilities or large space. They may have purchased them for their safety or merely because they like the way they look.

Instead of throwing stones at irresponsible consumers and manufacturers, let's take the high road and educate. Raising environmental awareness and lobbying for stricter sanctions on SUV manufacturers to meet fuel economy and emission standards would be the first step.

The United States has long dominated world energy consumption. Why don't we take our crusade a step farther and work to inform people from every walk of life of the importance of energy conservation?

Human nature longs for an outlet when confronted with fear and uncertainty. With war on the horizon and the realization that our country can be attacked, we want a tangible outlet to vent frustration and blame.

Let's work together to keep the blame where it belongs – with the real terrorists: the scum that are hijacking planes and training to kill innocent people.

VIRTUAL LOVE

Meeting people through Internet has advantages

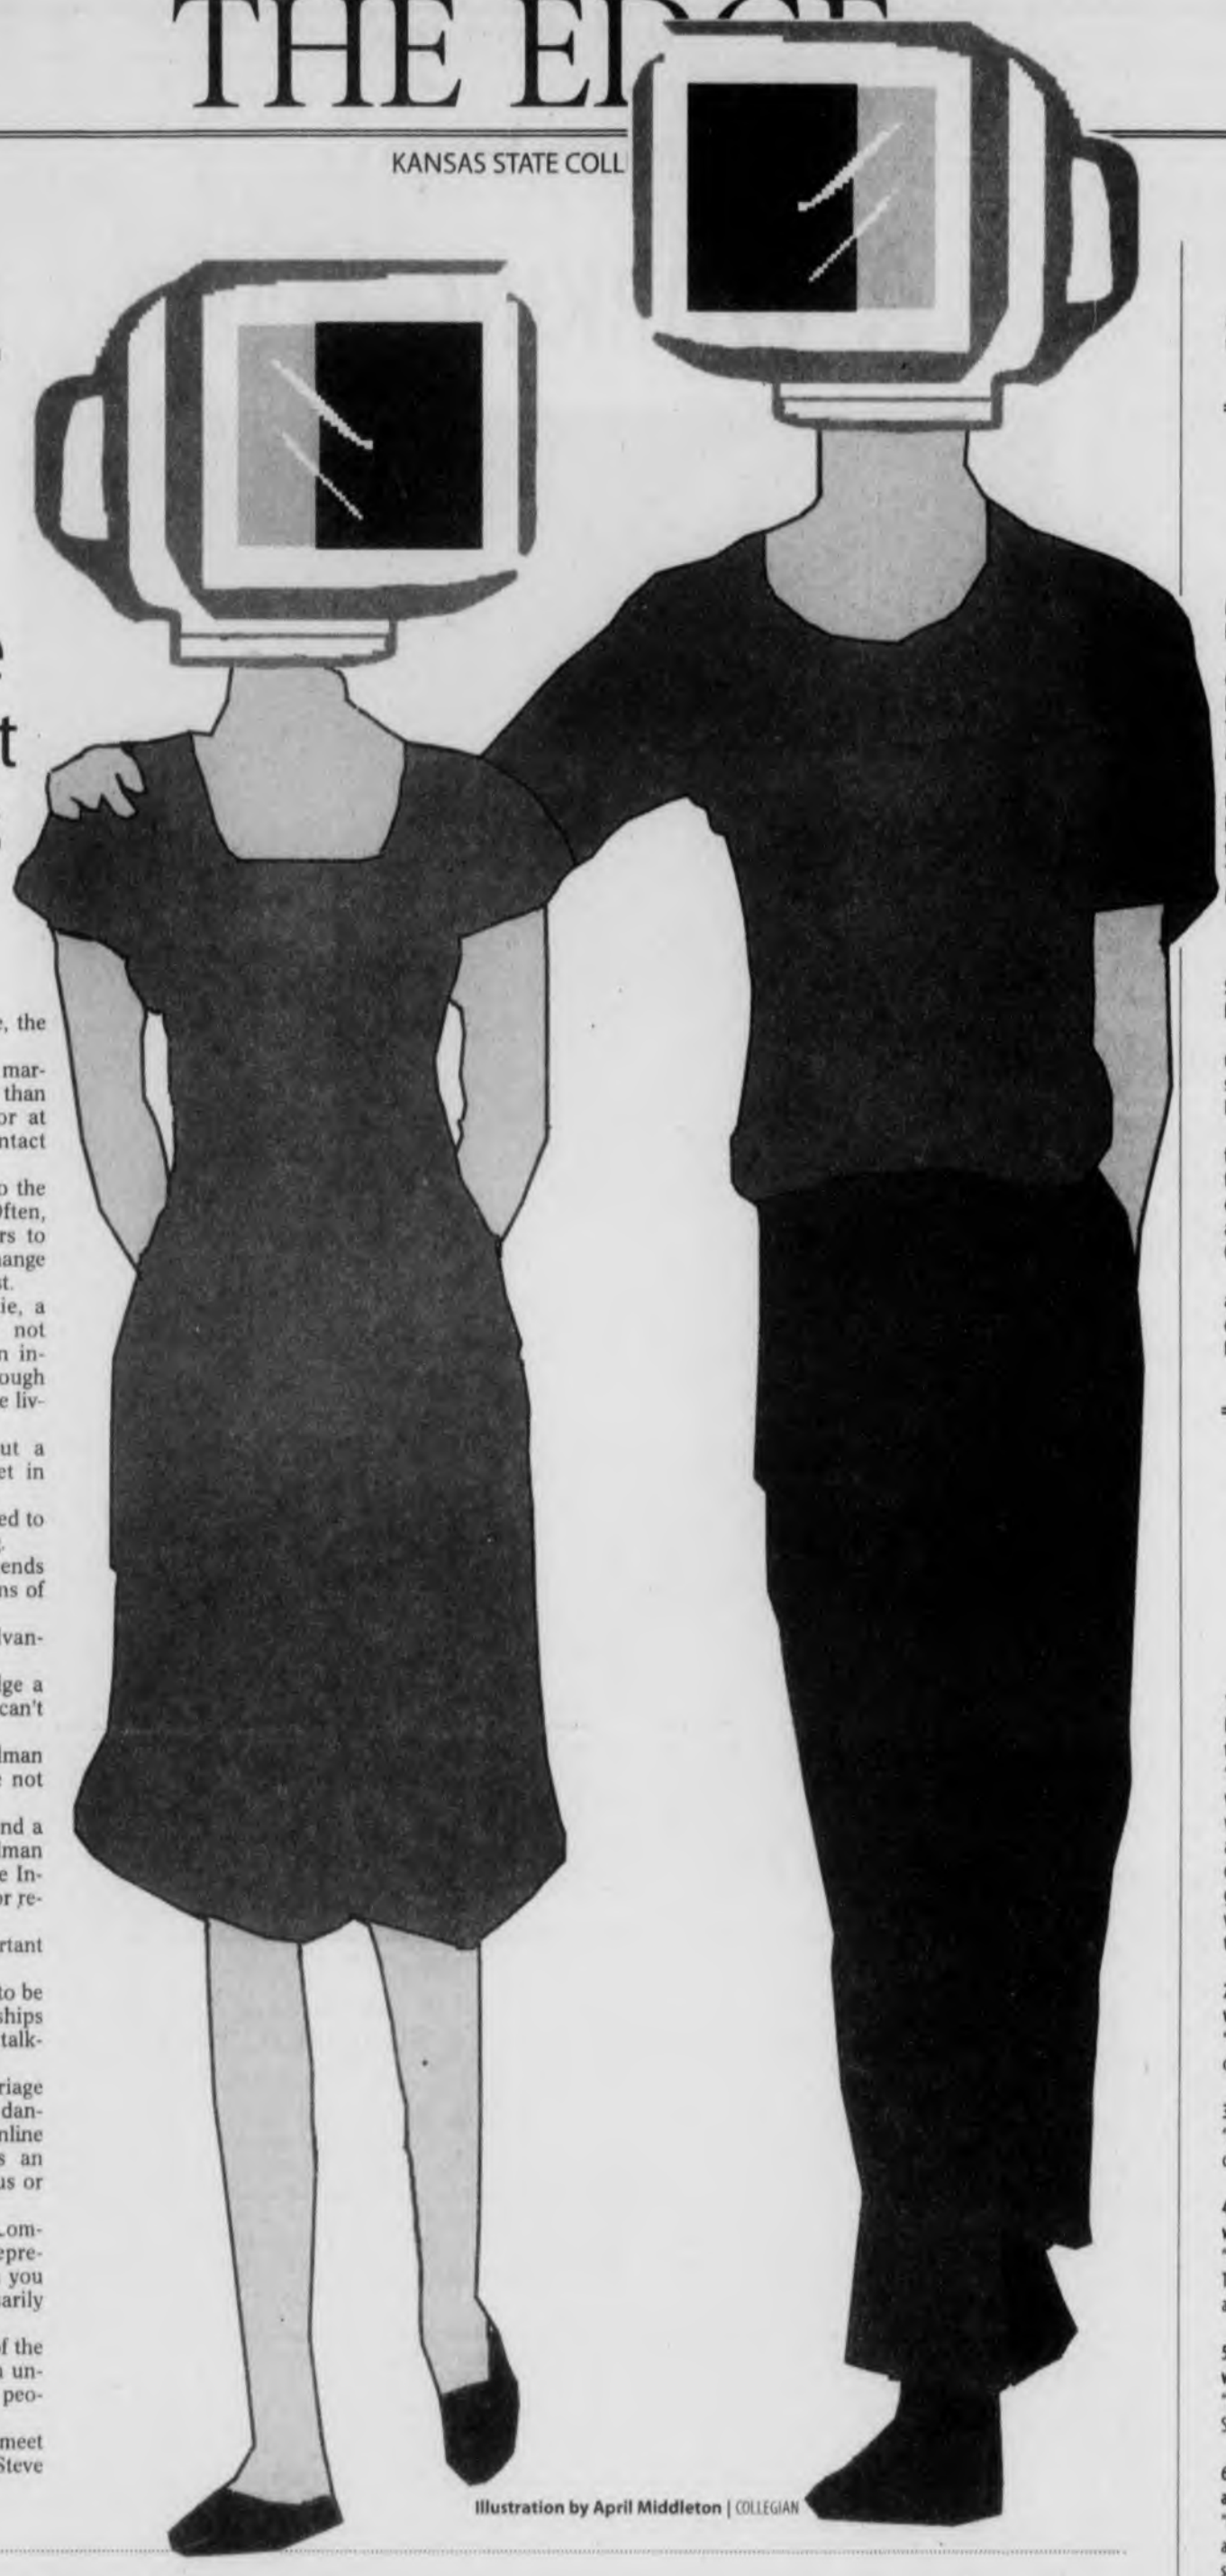

Illustration by April Middleton | COLLEGIAN

By Wendy Gorman
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Of all the places to meet your soulmate, the Internet seems the least likely place.

However, Steve and Kristie Sisson, who married on Jan. 4, would beg to differ. Rather than meeting through mutual acquaintances or at class, Kristie and Steve's first form of contact was over the Internet.

Single people are increasingly turning to the Internet to meet prospective partners. Often, singles use Web sites that allow members to post their photos and biographies and exchange e-mails with people who spark their interest.

Steve, senior in marketing, and Kristie, a 2001 graduate, discovered each other not through a dating service, but on ICQ, an instant-messaging system. They learned through their ICQ conversations that they both were living on Goodnow Hall's fifth floor.

After communicating online for about a month, Kristie and Steve agreed to meet in person.

Steve said their experience can be credited to the friendship they developed before dating.

"It was really just that we got to be friends first," he said. "We weren't thinking in terms of boyfriend and girlfriend."

Meeting a person online has other advantages, Kristie said.

"One of the pros is that you can't judge a person based on their exterior because you can't see that when you're chatting online."

Charlotte Edelman, a therapist with Edelman Associates, said Internet relationships are not always advisable.

"I have concerns about people who spend a great deal of time on the Internet," Edelman said. "People spend hours and hours on the Internet to the point it becomes a substitute for real-life interactions."

Edelman said safety also is a very important factor.

"There are certain dangers, and one has to be extremely cautious about online relationships because you don't know who you're really talking to," she said.

Nancy O'Conner, director of the Marriage and Family Therapy Clinic, said there are danger signals to look for when pursuing an online relationship. One of those indicators is an avoidance of questions about marital status or employment.

"If a person does not seem to be forthcoming, then that might mean they are misrepresenting themselves," she said. "Also, when you meet a person online, you don't necessarily have references to their character."

Steve and Kristie said they were aware of the dangers and initially didn't meet in person unless they were in a public place with other people they knew.

"You have to be smart about it and not meet at the Village Inn at two in the morning," Steve said.

Awareness of online dating dangers a necessary precaution

By J. Scott Bowman
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Computers have been used for playing games, listening to music and writing reports, but in the past few years, they have become tools for dating.

However, the dangers of Internet dating are a drawback for many, Jill Ellington, founder of Friendship Exchange, said. Not knowing if the other person is honest makes for an uncomfortable situation, she said.

"I interview and briefly screen each client and get to know who they are," she said. "From that, I will know who they are and try to match them up with another client."

Friendship Exchange, www.friendshipexchange.net, allows a third party to know each client, and the clients are kept relatively anonymous. The clients make the decision to accept dates, she said.

"I always consider safety a major factor," she said. "I get to meet each person and figure out their personality and see what they want for a significant other."

Some people don't use third parties and try to meet people online by themselves. That practice can be a very dangerous venture, said Lt. Jay Mills, investigator for the Riley County Police Department, and safety should always be the top priority.

"The main thing that one should think about is you really don't know who is on the other end," he said.

"In fact, there was a case about three to four years ago where we helped to track down a pedophile by posing as a juvenile on the Internet. One of our female officers made the arrest in City Park."

Mills said he thinks there are better and safer ways to date, and he doesn't recommend Internet dating.

"If someone is determined to get a date online, you should meet in a public place so if something goes wrong you aren't alone," Mills said.

Local bars can offer safe and neutral atmospheres, said Kip Etter, assistant manager at Rusty's Last Chance Bar and Saloon.

"For the most part, Manhattan is a small town," Etter said. "People should be an adult about dating and use your head."

Sundance film venerates 'Twin Towers' brothers killed at trade center

What had been the beginnings of a reality-TV pilot on a New York City police squad became painfully real for producer Dick Wolf on Sept. 11, 2001.

Creator of NBC's "Law & Order" franchise, he had a show in the works featuring interviews and footage of a police emergency services unit that was called into action Sept. 11 to help in the World Trade Center rescue.

After the attacks, Wolf used his footage as the basis for "Twin Towers," a half-hour documentary playing at the Sundance Film Festival that runs through Sunday.

PERSONALITY PROFILE

Pat Bosco
Dean of Student Life

1. What are you having for dinner tonight?
"My wife spent the weekend in Vegas with her girlfriends, and this is her first day back from a great trip, and we will probably go out to dinner."

2. What is in your CD player right now (or, who is your favorite artist right now?)
"Your dean does not have a CD player or own one CD."

3. What kind of car do you drive?
"I have a Jeep Cherokee with purple power cats on both sides of the vehicle."

4. What was the last movie you saw and why?
"'Gangs of New York.' I read the New York Times' Sunday review and it was very favorable."

5. What is your must-see TV show and why?
"I am a big HBO fan, and I enjoy the Sopranos."

6. What is your favorite place to eat out and why?
"Coco Bolos, Harry's, Gold Fork, Texas Star and Rock-A-Belly. They have great soups, salads and tremendous desserts."

7. Who is your idol and why?
"I admire the women in my life. My wife, my mother, my sister, my daughter — they all have achieved great things in many different ways."

8. What is your favorite drink?
"I enjoy a club soda with a little bit of cranberry juice with a couple slices of lime."

9. What is the craziest thing you did in college?
"No comment."

10. Have you ever cheated on a test?
"Probably."

Pasco's energy relies on rhythm

SEAN PURCELL

There are few people who start a game with as much emotion as Pervis Pasco.

When introduced, Pasco rises from the bench screaming in an effort to fire himself, teammates and fans up.

But against the University of Kansas, Pasco might as well have stayed on the bench in the first half.

Zero rebounds and no points after the first 20 minutes? What happened to being fired up?

It seems Pasco operates on adrenaline. It makes sense. When dunks, blocks and big boards are your game, adrenaline is what you thrive on.

So why, against the Jayhawks, couldn't Pasco get going?

The answer is simple. Rhythm.

Pasco needs a bucket, maybe a dunk, early in the contest to make himself feel involved in the system. As Pasco's touches decrease, his confidence around the glass falters as well.

The KU game was a perfect example. Foul trouble certainly didn't help, but when a player commits two turnovers while his team is on the wrong end of a 15-0 run, well, it's enough to shake anyone's confidence.

What Pasco needs to do is find a way to stay motivated. An early foul or turnover shouldn't shake you as a player. A 40-minute game is full of ebbs and flows.

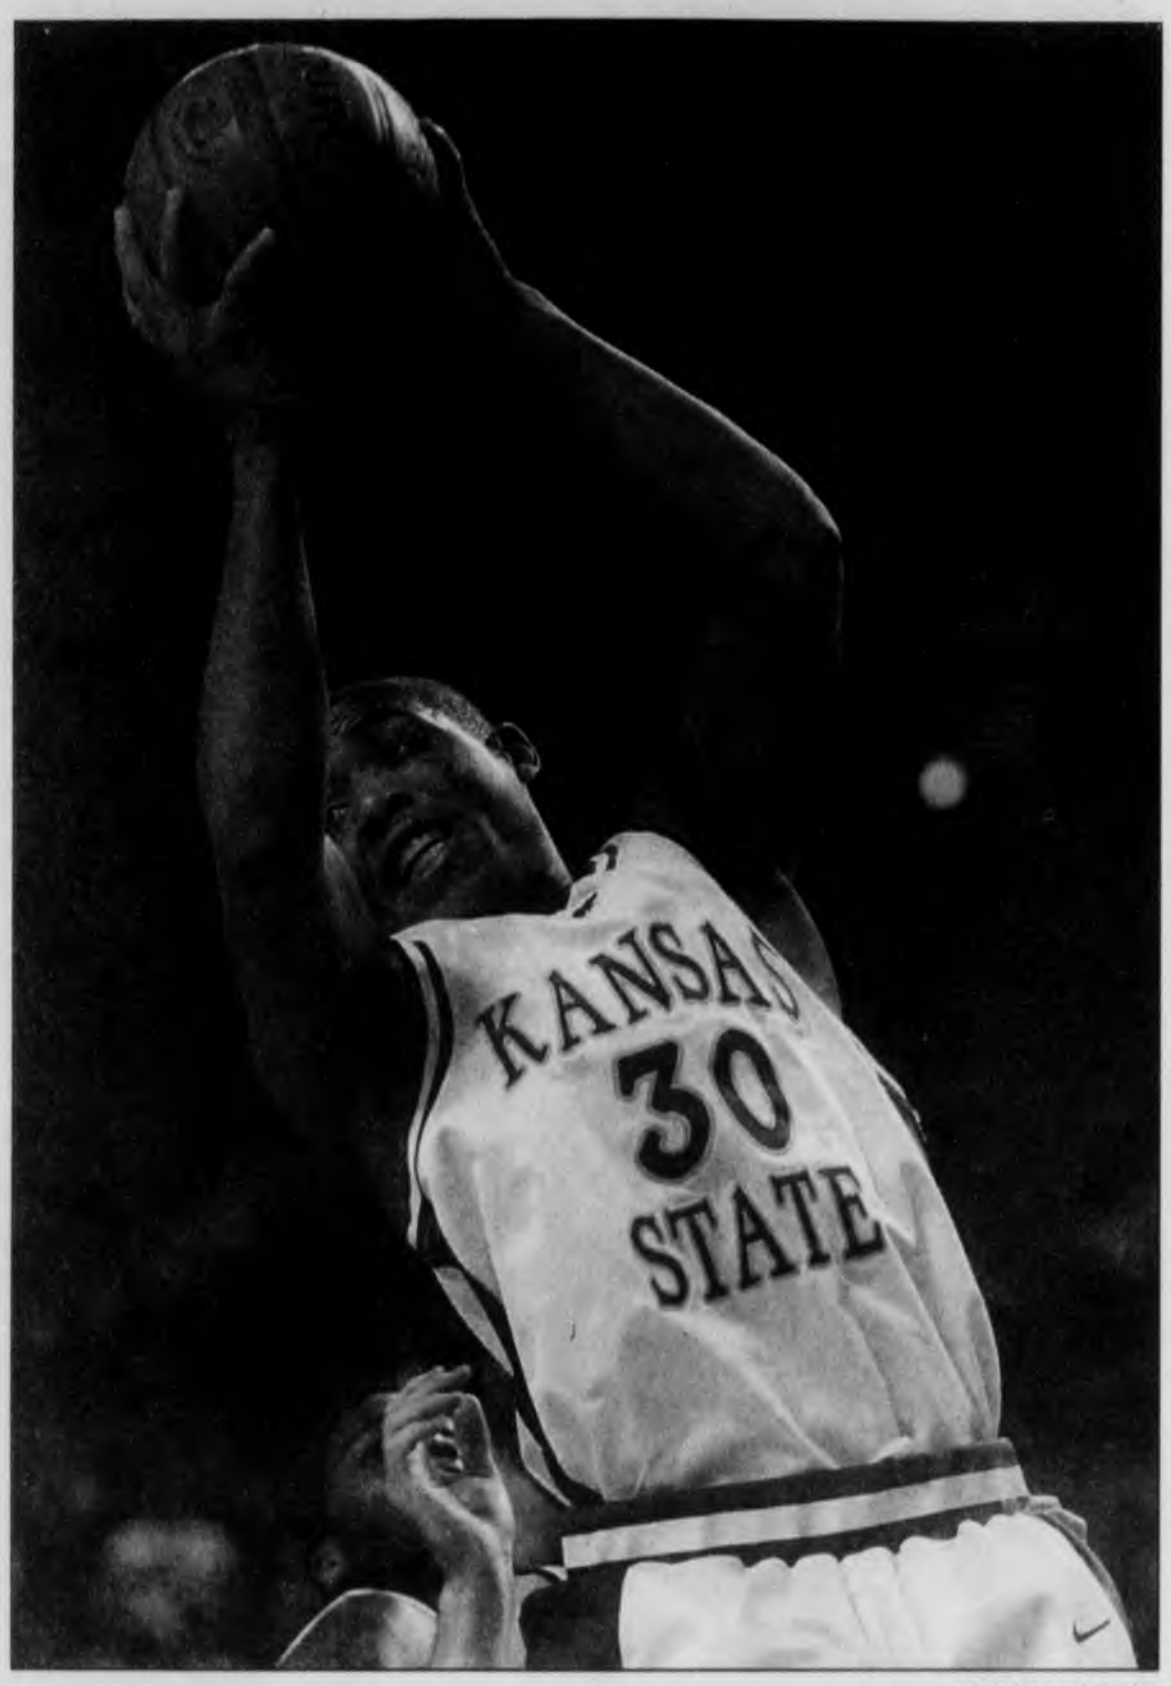
Pasco also needs to find a way to be active early on offense. Sure, many will say the reason Pasco didn't get involved was because KU's post defense was so good.

I don't buy it. Last season in Lawrence, Pasco tore the worshiped Drew Gooden for 20 points and 11 rebounds.

I know the 6-foot-9 senior can take it at anyone he wishes.

Probably one of Pasco's best games was last year against Nebraska at home. Leading the Wildcats with 16 points and 12 rebounds, Pasco also hit six of seven from the charity stripe for K-State. He was even in foul trouble during the game. Still, he found a way to overcome.

It just so happens those pesky Huskers are back in town tonight.



K-State needs a lift, and Pasco can deliver. A great man has repeatedly said K-State will go only as far as Pasco will take it. That man is Matt Siebrandt.

The Wildcats have come along nicely so far this season. They can go even farther with big performances by Pasco.

K-State vs. Nebraska

A Working Hart

Matt Stamey | COLLEGIAN

Jarrett Hart grabs a rebound during the second half of K-State's victory over Lipscomb. Hart is averaging 6.8 points and 2.2 rebounds per game so far this season.

Cats welcome junior guard, look to snap skid with NU game

By Sean Purcell
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It's been a long wait for Jarrett Hart.

Having dealt with a nagging back injury that cost him three games and a DUI that cost him another, the junior guard said he's ready to play in front of some purple and white at 7 tonight when K-State (10-6, 1-2) faces Nebraska (9-7, 1-2) at Bramlage Coliseum.

"I felt pretty bad not being able to contribute these past few games," Hart said. "I think I learned a lot by sitting down, and I think I've handled it pretty well."

Hart's last game at home was against Monmouth on Dec. 29, a game the Wildcats won 73-64. Hart, however, was held scoreless in nine minutes of action.

But with Hart fully recovered, and after serving his one-game suspension on the bench at Colorado, he will provide another body, for Coach Jim Wooldridge to rotate into the lineup.

Nebraska (9-7, 1-2) at K-State (10-6, 1-2)
When: 7 tonight
Where: Bramlage Coliseum

"There are a lot of things Jarrett does for our team that perhaps don't show up on the stat sheet," Wooldridge said. "He's a very good ball mover, he helps our team stay in a flow and we think he can score as well.

"He gives us another shooter, another ball handler, another good decision maker and helps you function as a team."

Hart saw the floor extensively against Kansas on Saturday, coming off the bench to score five points and grab four rebounds in 22 minutes of work.

The Wildcat's next game, tonight against the Huskers, pits two teams with a penchant for epic battles at Bramlage.

Two years ago, Nebraska nipped K-State 63-61 in Wooldridge's first year as the Wildcats' coach. Last season, K-State hit some timely free throws down the stretch to put the Huskers away 67-58.

Hart said being at home means taking care of business.

"These home wins are important because we want to be on the top of the list come March," he said.

Even with the addition of a healthy Hart, Wooldridge said he still plans to start junior guard Tim Ellis, who filled the vacancy with Hart out.

Ellis is averaging 11.7 points per game, second to Gilson DeJesus, including 14 per game during Hart's absence.

"Tim has played well enough to earn the right to start," Wooldridge said. "But if you look at the minutes now, with Frank, Tim and now getting Jarrett back on the floor, we're going to distribute those minutes fairly equally."

Nebraska also has had to rely on players stepping up for injured personnel – only they will be forced to do it for the remainder of the season.

Sophomore guard Jake Muhleisen suffered a fractured hip socket against Kansas on Jan. 11, and is expected to miss eight to 12 weeks.

Last season, Muhleisen's 28 points were key in a 99-82 Nebraska win over K-State in Lincoln.

But K-State is not focused on Muhleisen's injury, Hart said.

The Wildcats, he said, are more concerned with not letting two losses in a row become three.

"This week's theme coach has been talking about is 'What are we doing,'" Hart said. "It's not what the other team is doing, it's what we are doing and if we do what we're supposed to do, we'll be all right. If we don't do that, we're going to make it tough on ourselves."

DeJesus' hard work, persistence beginning to pay off in 2002-03 season

By Joel Reichenberger
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Gilson DeJesus walked down the Bramlage Coliseum tunnel on media day ready to answer questions.

Reporters swarmed around highlight-maker Pervis Pasco, hit up senior leader Matt Siebrandt and crawled all over incoming junior college players Tim Ellis, Jarrett Hart and Frank Richards.

Meanwhile, DeJesus found a chair beside the court and waited his turn.

Thirty minutes later – after talking to no one – DeJesus walked back up the tunnel to the locker room, not surprised at the lack of attention.

In 2001-02, his first season at K-State, DeJesus didn't impress a lot of people. His 6.2 points per game didn't raise any eyebrows, and aside from one big night against Wichita State, DeJesus went about his game quietly.

"I didn't do a good job, so I don't expect them to appreciate it a lot," the senior said.

Little appeared to be different as the 2002-03 campaign got underway.

He scored three points in the opener and nine against Northwestern. He tied a career high with 21 against Arkansas-Pine Bluff, but only managed seven at Wisconsin-Green Bay.

Then DeJesus went nuclear.

He dropped 12 on Texas-Pan American, went five for six from three-point

See DEJESUS Page 8

Gilson DeJesus, K-State senior forward, currently is second in the Big 12 in three-point field goals with 52 percent.

Basketball | Big 12 weekly honorees named

Texas' Stacy Stephens was named Big 12 Women's Basketball Player of the Week, and Texas Tech's Erin Grant was named Big 12 Rookie of the Week for the third time this season in a vote of a media panel, the conference office announced Tuesday.

Oklahoma State senior Victor Williams is the Phillips 66 Big 12 Men's Player of the Week, while teammate Kevin Bookout was honored as the Phillips 66 Big 12 Rookie of the Week.

DEJESUS | Despite slow start to K-State career, senior forward currently ranks 2nd in 3-point shooting in Big 12 range against Wichita State and had 21 points on six-of-six three-point shooting against Oregon State.

DeJesus now averages a team-leading 12.7 points per game.

He's found his mark and ridden a sweet jumper to become one of the nation's best shooters. He ranks second in the Big 12 in 3-point shooting and is 13th in the nation.

It's come up rather fast, DeJesus said, but he knew all along it would come.

"I knew I could play, but I think last year wasn't my turn," he said.

"It wasn't my year. I had a lot to learn about everything: Division I basketball, the Big 12, the K-State system and how hard you have to work outside practice."

Coach Jim Wooldridge agreed that DeJesus has learned his lesson when it comes to practice.

Over the summer, DeJesus worked harder and longer than any other player, Wooldridge said. He scrimmaged, he lifted, he swam and he shot. He became what his coach knew he could be, and even better.

"We thought we would get more out of him a year ago," Wooldridge said.

"I didn't know he would be this reliable until we started playing games.

He came out of the gate with great confidence and has not relinquished that confidence."

Shooting isn't the only way DeJesus shows off his work ethic.

He leads the team in scoring, but is also second in rebounding. Against Texas Tech, he scored 19 points and grabbed 15 boards.

He said that every time he touches the court, he strives to produce a well-rounded game. Understanding how important that is and an improving feel for the game are major parts of his turnaround, he said.

"That is what's most important – knowing where you have to be," DeJesus said.

The fruits of DeJesus' labor are starting to pay off.

K-State Sports Information reports that he is now the most-requested interview. DeJesus said it's that sort of attention that makes all the work he's put in worth it.

"If I do a good job, then I hope they appreciate it," he said.

"That makes me feel good. It is always good to know that people want to know about you and want to talk to you. It feels good to know that all that work I put in over the summer is paying off now."

Kansas banks in need of blood

Increase in surgeries during holidays among reasons for shortage

By Jessica Pitts
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The nation's blood banks issued an urgent appeal for blood donations last week, and in Kansas, the appeal is no different.

"At one point we only had eight units of O negative blood on our shelves, and we like to have at least 100," said Bree Cox, communications supervisor for American Red Cross Central Plains Region Blood Services.

While Cox said the area hospitals have a higher supply of blood on hand, one trauma patient can require 50 units of blood.

"That can quickly deplete their supply," Cox said. "It is not uncommon for the hospitals to ask us for blood on a daily basis, and with supplies this low, we are afraid we won't be able to replenish their supply."

What: Manhattan Area Blood Drive
Where: Pottorf Hall in CiCo Park
When: Noon to 6 p.m. Feb. 11, and 8 a.m. to 2 p.m. Feb. 12

■ K-State's Blood Drive is April 7-11, times to be announced.

The Central Plains Region, which supplies blood to more than 100 hospitals in Kansas and northern Oklahoma, tries to keep at least a three-day supply on hand.

"We are starting to pull out of the shortage, but we still really need all blood donors who are eligible to donate," Cox said.

January is a traditionally tight month, Cox said, and the reasons for the shortage vary.

"It seems to be a combination of things. The usage tends to be slightly higher because people will generally put off surgeries until after the holidays and the number of people who are sick is a little higher in January."

The weather also has an effect on the number of units donated. A blood drive was recently canceled in Russell, Kan., because of snow, putting the Central Plains Region behind 85 units.

"It doesn't seem that traumatic, but one cancellation leads to another cancellation, and that can quickly add up," she said.

To adequately supply all hospitals in the area, the region needs to collect 500 units of

RCPD conducts warrant search

By Crystal Becker
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Riley County Police Department will be out in full force today, as approximately 23 officers conduct Project Warrants Day. In its second annual department-wide search, RCPD will spend the day trying to find and arrest about 100 people with outstanding warrants.

RCPD Captain Gary Grubbs said the project is a way to clear a backlog of warrants that accumulate throughout the year.

"We have a backlog of approximately 2,000 warrants," Grubbs said. "We prioritize out the approximately 100 warrants we'll be serving."

Grubbs said warrants are selected based on bond amounts, severity of the crime and the probability that the individuals are still in the area.

"Many individuals are no longer in the area. I will feel fortunate if we are able to serve even half of them," he said. "Fifty to seventy-five arrests would be a success."

Grubbs said although many may have left the area, the warrants are still active.

"We have NCIC, a national crime information computer, that is maintained by the FBI and provides a national database for warrants," he said. "When someone is stopped, say for a traffic violation,

PRESIDENTIAL MATRIMONY

Student body president plans for couplehood

By Jennifer Gier
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

January not only marked the beginning of a new year, but also the first time in more than 10 years that a K-State student body president was wed while in office.

On Jan. 3, 2003, Student Body President Zac Cook married Mary Hoke, a December graduate in management information systems. The ceremony, which took place at the First United Methodist Church in Manhattan, had more than 350 guests, including many K-State students and alumni.

The wedding party also included K-State students like Student Body Vice President Todd Kohman, a senior in marketing. Kohman was a groomsman as well as Josh Sturgis, a senior in political science. Two of Mary's Gamma Phi Beta sorority sisters served as bridesmaids.

When the wedding party arrived at Zac and Mary's reception, at Houston Street Ballroom, the DJ introduced wedding party members and played the "Wabash Cannonball." After being announced to the guests, Zac, Mary and the wedding party did the Wabash. Zac had no idea the Wabash Cannonball would be played.

Mary Beth and Zac Cook were married on Jan 3, 2003 in Manhattan. Mary Beth, who is about to take a six-week language course in Prague, Czech Republic, said she doesn't plan on taking any public role as the unofficial first lady of K-State.

"I wanted to have the Wabash played because everyone involved with the wedding are huge K-State fans, and I thought it would be a fun way to tie in some K-State," Mary said.

Zac is not the first student body president to get married while in office. He said the last instance of a student body president marrying while in office occurred in 1977-78.

Ironically, that president, Terry Matlack's, daughter Amy Diediker sang at Zac and Mary's wedding.

"We are good friends," Mary said. "We met through our sorority. Her husband is an engineering major, and Zac knew them through that."

As Zac's wife, Mary said she has no plans to take an active political role at Zac's side. That is largely because she is leaving for Prague, Czech Republic, on Jan. 30 for a language program.

Although Mary will not be at Zac's side for the remainder of his term, she said she supports many of the plans Zac is implementing.

"I know he wants to get more done for international programs in the last few months he is in office," Mary said. "International programs are the biggest reason he ran for office. He really wants to see more exchanges and more students going abroad."

CAMPUS JOBS

The Collegian takes a closer look at students who earn their college cash on campus.

Randall, senior in creative writing, is one of more than 60 students who work for K-State Student Union Food Service Catering. The catering department is part of Chartwells Dining Services, a food contract service that provides for the Union.

"It is laid back and well organized," Randall said. "They give you a specific task to do, so it is not stressful working here. Plus, you definitely have the free-food hook-up."

The food service caters receptions and banquets, mainly in the Union or the K-State Alumni Center. The service has served weddings, scholarship dinners, tailgates and even in the sky boxes at football games. Pam Soeken, catering director of the Union Food Service, said that 80 percent of the employees are students, from freshmen to graduates.

Students work anywhere from five to 30 hours each week, and pay starts at $5.50 per hour.

Usually servers work a five-to-six-hour shift, which includes setting up for the meal or buffet, serving the guests,

Interior designer stresses importance of originality, creativity in lifetime success; uses MLK Jr. to inspire own designs

By Stephani Edington
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Going against the flow can lead to success in design and, sometimes, even a little bit of fame, a speaker said Wednesday.

Courtney Sloane, founding principal and creative director of Alternative Design, an interior design firm out of New York City, spoke as part of the Ekdahl Memorial Lecture series and in remembrance of Martin Luther King Jr. on Wednesday at Forum Hall.

The Ekdahl Memorial Lecture series is in memory of Oscar Ekdahl, K-State alumnus and Topeka architect.

Sloane said she uses King's work and legacy to inspire her own work.

"I feel that, as a designer, I have tried to follow that legacy," said Sloane.

Sloane showed short video clips and a slide show presentation of some of the work she has done for various clients, which include Queen Latifah and P. Diddy as well as Disney and Sony Recording Studios, and gave a brief explanation of how the company carries out business.

"First, we come up with what we like to call the hook, or the overall theme," she said.

"Then we create a look book, which is photos and pictures of our ideas on how to carry out the hook."

Sometimes, they will make the look book into a short video clip, Sloane said. They then consult with the client and begin work on whatever is approved.

Sloane said some projects can take anywhere from months to years.

One creative project Alternative Design did was the exhibition "20 Years of Hip Hop" at the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame and Museum in Cleveland. This allowed the company to get involved with exhibit design rather than just interior design, she said.

Sloane said her business is also making an effort to work more closely with college students.

"We now have two interns," she said. "We are really trying to create an avenue for that to happen."

The College of Architecture, Planning and Design chose to invite Sloane to speak at K-State as part of the lecture series.

Ben Bullock, professor of interior architecture, said Sloane was chosen for several reasons.

"Her work is not run of the mill," he said.

"It's more exciting, not traditional, forward loading. The clientele she has is more willing to accept more exciting design. She's one of the most prominent interior designers of today."

A reception where students and faculty could talk with and ask questions of Sloane followed the presentation.

Jenny West, sophomore in interior architecture, said she was impressed with Sloane's presentation and was interested in the ideas that she spoke about.

"I was impressed with the videos and slide shows, and the technology she used to portray ideas to the clients," West said.

West was not the only K-State student who was impressed with Sloane's program. Many students spoke with Sloane after her presentation, telling her what they thought of Alternative Design and its projects.

"I like the work her company does. The visuals really caught my eye," Raymond Stubblefield, junior in architecture, said.

Dennis Law, dean of the College of Architecture, Planning and Design, said he was glad she could make it, even though weather conditions were not ideal.

"It's an honor to have someone of her stature here," Law said.

Sloane said the one thing she wanted the students to get out of her visit was not to be afraid to explore opportunities.

"The possibilities are endless as to what direction you can go in the design field, " she said.

BEST BETS | FOR THIS WEEKEND

1 | THE GREAT DIVIDE If you haven't checked out their latest album, "Remain," you had better get down to Aggieville tonight and see what you've been missing. The country-rock foursome will be playing tonight at Longhorn's along with special guest, "No Justice." Doors open at 8 p.m.

2 | K-STATE AFTER HOURS It's cold outside and it just doesn't make much sense to trot from bar to bar in Aggieville on a freezing Friday night. Head to the K-State Student Union to make your own videos, make a snowman thermometer and eat some chili. Starts at 7 p.m. and goes until 1 a.m.

See Reese Witherspoon in "Sweet Home Alabama" Saturday or Sunday in the Union Forum Hall.

Catch Laurie Koehn and the Cats in a battle for first place against Texas on Saturday at Bramlage Coliseum.

3 | SWEET HOME ALABAMA Why would you not want to go to a movie that only costs two bucks? UPC will be showing this down-home comedy throughout the weekend in Forum Hall. Either make it to the Saturday showings at 7 or 9:30 p.m., or the Sunday show at 8 p.m.

4 | CATS VS. LONGHORNS Visit that little coliseum south of the football stadium to cheer on the No. 4 women's basketball team as they take on the No. 18 Texas Longhorns. The game starts at 1 p.m. Saturday at Bramlage Coliseum.

5 | NICHOLAS NICKLEBY Since the film version of the classic family drama never made it to the Manhattan theaters, make a trip to the Manhattan Public Library and brush up on the tale before it comes out on video. Or track down the flick in a nearby town and take a special road trip.

Hale Library reduces books, journals

By Kelli Pitman
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Hale Library hours are no longer in jeopardy for the spring semester, but budget cuts are still giving Hale users headaches.

Hale Library Dean Brice Hobrock said the library will not have fluctuating hours. The hours will remain the same to accommodate students' requests.

However, the lack of funds still remains. The problem that the library faces now is the extreme inflation that has caused book and scholarly journal prices to soar. The 14-percent inflation rate has caused a $358,000-increase in journal prices and a $24,000-increase in books.

"The issue of inflation is not one that the general public has much knowledge about," Hobrock said. "They do not understand just how expensive information is."

The immediate effect of inflated prices will result in a $450,000 reduction in books and journals that are purchased by the library.

Hobrock said that most of the journals that will be cut are science-related due to their large cost. Because of their research-based content, these cuts will affect mainly graduate students and faculty.

Krista Clark, graduate student in biology, said cutbacks in the number of scientific journals will slow students down when trying to complete papers and dissertations. Now, students will have to acquire resources electronically, through individual professors or from other universities.

"This has been a problem for about two years. As subscriptions expire, the library does not have the funds to renew them so journals are slowly becoming harder and harder to find," Clark said.

For a student to subscribe to a journal personally, it would cost between $75 and $100, but for the library to buy the same subscription, it could cost $800. One way to avoid the cost is interlibrary loans from other universities.

Hobrock warns, though, that they have to be careful with certain copyright laws. Many times, it is more expensive to pay copyright fees than to pay for the subscription.

Faculty members could are also be frustrated with the reduction in subscriptions. If the library does not subscribe to a certain journal, professors have to take it from individual grant money, which takes away funds for equipment, Hobrock said.

Evan Semón | COLLEGIAN
A $450,000 reduction in books and journals purchased by Hale Library is part of a budget cut that may leave some of the shelves in the library empty.

Brian Spooner, director of the Division of Biology, said that attaining journals has been a problem for years.

"We try to collectively get electronic information to share among each other to help reduce the cost," he said.

Spooner said that having adequate resources is not as much a problem for the department as for each individual professor. Depending on his or her specific research, a professor must find the information that he or she needs individually.

The university has to decide what it is going to do to maintain efforts to support information growth. That will determine the library's role in how it allocates its funds.

"There are too many uncertainties right now," Hobrock said. "We have to do the best we can with what we have to provide a quality education."

Guards arrest Kuwaiti in shooting of American

By Alaa Shahine
ASSOCIATED PRESS

DUBAI, United Arab Emirates – Saudi border guards Wednesday arrested a Kuwaiti suspected of killing one American and critically wounding another in an ambush in Kuwait, the official Saudi Press Agency reported.

The agency quoted an unidentified Interior Ministry official as saying the Kuwaiti was arrested "sneaking into Saudi Arabia from Kuwait."

"The initial investigation revealed that he was the assailant who fired on the American citizens on Tuesday," the report said.

A Kuwaiti government spokesman said he would not comment on the report until later Thursday.

The two men, civilian contractors working for the U.S. military, were ambushed Tuesday near Camp Doha, about 10 miles west of Kuwait City. Police said a gunman hiding behind a hedge about 3 miles from the base opened fire with a Kalashnikov on the Americans' sports utility vehicle while it was at a stoplight.

David Caraway was in stable condition Wednesday at al-Razi hospital in Kuwait City. His co-worker Michael Rene Pouliot was killed in the attack.

The shooting was the first assault on U.S. civilians in Kuwait and the third on Americans since October in the oil-rich emirate, where pro-American sentiment is usually strong and where thousands of U.S. troops are assembling for a possible war on Iraq.

On Oct. 8, two Kuwaiti Muslims opened fire on Marines taking a break from training, killing one and injuring another. Other Marines shot and killed the assailants. A policeman also shot at two U.S. soldiers in their civilian car on a highway on Nov. 21.

Kuwaiti officials have described the attacks as isolated incidents. Most of Kuwait's 2.2 million population welcomes Americans, a lingering sentiment from the U.S.-led coalition that drove out Iraqi invaders during the 1991 Gulf War.

Students battle blocked accounts as officials explain ways to watch, avoid unpaid balances

By Edie Hall
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

To her surprise, Meredith Seitz found herself paying for her brother's mistakes.

When Seitz, senior in marketing, went to Parking Services to buy a parking permit for spring 2003, she learned she had to take care of some unpaid parking tickets before she would be allowed to purchase a permit.

Seitz said she was more than willing to pay the tickets that she had received but didn't expect to be asked to pay a $20 ticket her older brother had received in 1997, when neither Seitz nor her brother were attending K-State.

"My brother had one from 1997, but he didn't even go to K-State," she said. "He might have got it when he was running an errand or something, but I couldn't get my parking permit until I paid it."

Darwin Abbott, director of Parking Services, said that while there sometimes are problems with siblings getting stuck with each other's tickets because they share a car, it should not be a problem if the siblings drive separate cars.

"It's complicated when two or three siblings use the same vehicle," Abbott said. "It's difficult because it becomes an internal family thing."

Seitz said she and her brother did not share a car.

"I didn't understand or agree with having to pay for my brother's ticket," Seitz said. "I had an unpaid parking ticket, and I was more than willing to pay for it, but even if it's a relative of mine, I shouldn't be responsible for paying their ticket. Parking Services should take it up with them."

Seitz might not be the only student frustrated with a type of hold being put on his or her account due to unpaid balances.

Students can also have holds on their academic accounts that block them from dropping or adding classes or getting their transcripts if they owe money to a variety of places at K-State, including Parking Services, Hale Library, the Department of Housing and Dining Services, Recreational Services and Lafene Health Center.

Jim Bach, director of accounting services, said K-State puts a hold on a student's account if the student has an outstanding balance, which is a balance that has gone past due for 30 days.

Bach said the system of putting a hold on a student's account has evolved over time.

"There are a lot of services that have been added to our billing system over the past years," Bach said. "But it's not a new process."

Each service must send delinquent accounts to the billing and receivables system before a hold will be put on the student's academic account.

Abbott said Parking Services is not in a "hurry" to send delinquent tickets, or tickets that are unpaid for 30 days.

"We don't want to send huge numbers of tickets over there and then have to take them back," Abbott said. "What we don't want to do is have folks run up huge bills where it's possible to get wheel locks and tows. Anybody can get those, and this way, you are at least reminded to pay your tickets."

Janice Barrons, circulation unit head at Hale, said students may have a hold put on their account if they don't return a book they've checked out.

She said that if students do not return a book within 30 days of its due date, they are sent a bill for a "lost" book. She said that after it is considered "lost," students have until the 10th of the month to respond. If they do not, students will receive a hold on their account.

When Hale blocks a student's academic account, the student's privileges at the library are also taken away until the bill is paid. Barrons said if a student believes he or she did return a book, Hale will lift the hold on the person's account so he or she may register for classes. But the university will still block the student's transcript until the matter is settled.

Barrons suggested students renew books by phone or by going to www.lib.ksu.edu/catalog before the books become overdue. Students also can check the status of their accounts at this site.

"We want students to know we are here to help them and do not want them to get library fines or lost-book fees," Barrons said.

Unfortunately, if students do leave K-State without paying outstanding balances, their bills can eventually be sent to a collection agency, which may hurt their credit record.

"It's not worth it to mess up your credit record. They're going to want to buy a house or a car someday," Barrons said. "When you're young, you don't even think about it."

Bach said K-State generally doesn't have a problem with students not paying their bills.

"It's not very common," he said, "because of the students K-State has recruited historically. Midwestern students are usually pretty good about paying their bills."

However, he said that if students do have questions about money they may owe, they can check their balances on the KATS Web site.

"The delinquent balances and holds are on KATS and are accessible at any time," he said. "I recommend students check the KATS system as a final check before they come in to add or drop classes."

OPINION

TO THE POINT

Students should give blood now, avoid waiting

The American Red Cross blood banks have empty shelves.

As patients delay surgery until after the holidays, meaning a higher demand for blood, blood banks are seeing their supplies depleted.

Not only that, but blood drives are being canceled because of snowy conditions. A blood drive scheduled in Russell, Kan. was canceled, leaving the Central Plains Region with 85 less units of blood than expected.

To the point is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

Five hundred units of blood are needed each day to adequately supply the region, but with only 5 percent of the population giving blood, a shortage remains.

Additional blood drives are not an option, as the Red Cross is utilizing all its staff members for regularly scheduled drives.

It takes only an hour to make a donation. Rather than spending an hour of their day staring aimlessly at the TV or talking on the phone, students have the opportunity to save a life.

Blood drives will come to K-State next month, but students should actively seek out locations to donate blood rather than waiting for the blood drive to come to them.

For more information, call 1-800-GIVE-LIFE to help restock the shelves.

DEFINE COOL

MLK Jr. week invokes thoughts regarding what it means to be "cool"

LAYTON EHMKE

In this week of the King (MLK styleee), I am reminded of how we as Americans culturally define what it is to be "cool."

One reason is that someone once tried to tell me that black people invented "cool." Whether or not you believe that, white people are cool, too. Is there a difference between white "cool" and black "cool"? Sure there is. But can't we all be "cool" in our own ways without arguing over who invented it? And yes, it's styleee with three E's.

It's not that I didn't briefly pause to recognize the significance of King this week, but he's not really my hero, although he was an amazing and inspiring fellow, and very cool.

Regular people who were not "cool" at birth attain true "cool" usually around age 19. If you're not "cool" by 19 at the latest, you will never be. This is unless of course a young person grants you sympathy "coolness" when you're elderly. But don't count on it.

Now, the best way to exemplify "cool" is through the stars of film and rock.

White people who know the difference between good "cool" and "uncool" understand that Steve McQueen is a god of "cool." That goes for Clint Eastwood, Eddie Vedder, the Fonz, Harrison Ford and anybody who played James Bond.

Three white guys whom I don't claim are Steven Segal, Andrew "Dice" Clay and the "dude-you're-getting-a-Dell" dingleberry. These guys are complete nipples. Munch that.

The differences of racially tailored "cool" are subtle but certainly powerful in their own right. The black guys who are "cool" have really got a handle on the suaveness of it all. Cool Afro-Americans: Dolomite (M.F.), Samuel L., Jimi Hendrix, Chris Rock, C-Rowe, Snoop, and yes, Danny Glover is kind of "cool," too. Kind of.

The thing about "cool" guys, white or black, is how they emote "coolness" with such ease. They never really lose their tempers. Could you even imagine Snoop Dogg and Clint Eastwood in a shouting match? No. Because it wouldn't happen.

Here's a beef of mine that we should settle right here and right now. What is the deal with Michael Jackson? Where did his "coolness" go? Don't get me wrong, but for a while it looked like Jacko was going to turn out to be a really "cool" black guy. Look at him now and be forever blinded. The sun reflecting off his nose could melt entire legions of his fans.

Hmm, let's see. He's not black. He's too white. He's probably not Asian either, or is he? Even if he were Asian, he wouldn't be half as "cool" as Bruce Lee. No way.

Some say that Jacko has transcended to a race all his own. Tell me that's not selfish.

So my question is, if his race had a name, what would it be? Clear? Colgate? Opaque Albino?

Let's just agree that he's crazy. Good lord, did anyone catch his "message to the children" on "Entertainment Tonight"? He promised "a very good time without grownups."

Please excuse me while I projectile vomit. I'd rather choke down a tall glass of warm scrantwater than spend a weekend on Jacko's freaky ferris wheel.

Anyway, the border that separates "cool" from fool is simply a matter of confidence. Cool people are confident and carry the scent of power about them. So Yoda is "cool", and he's not white or black. Which reminds me that Kermit the Frog is "cool" too.

Cool guys never appear to have a temper. But if you pissed them off, they could snap your spine with a one-two Judo jab, light a cigarette, and hit on your girlfriend all in one smooth, sweatless motion.

The rise of "cool" itself has a legendary story, as it has lasted in this culture for generations. Its fundamental meaning really hasn't changed in decades, which is truly amazing considering the rate at which people chat online, morphing our language at a phenomenal rate.

I hope there will still be "cool" people hundreds of years from now, and that the people who know them will call them "cool."

But never claim that you invented "cool." To get away with that means there will be people saying they were the creators of the knock-knock joke, scrantwater, and low-neck sweaters.

It's peace week. So, peace (out).

Definition of equality ever-changing due to evolution of morals, increased need for immediate personal gain

ZACH HAUSER

Women scantily clad, dressed as animals in cages on a street corner. Did that get your attention? The People for the Ethical Treatment of Animals, in a push to shed light on the neglect of animals, has models parading their bodies to all who happen to walk down the street.

The aim is to make people think about the animals next time before they grab a hamburger at McDonalds. But instead of thinking about the unfortunate animals, I'm confronted with an attractive model clad only in body paint meant to resemble a chicken.

You can see where the conflict of interest lies. But ironically, my beef is not with PETA.

What's so incredibly wrong about all this is that some feminists support efforts like these around the country. There seems to be a new wave of clamoring filibusters who are sick of staging sit-ins indoors and have moved to protest where their voices are heard by thousands of people passing along the sidewalk. Call it a sit-out or call it absurd, but don't call it kosher.

Women shout that they want to be respected while they wield physical seduction as a tool for getting what they want. Men try to use physical seduction until they sadly realize that they've got better chances with alcohol.

Somewhere in this cultural renaissance, our evolving morals and common sense have gone the way of the dinosaur at the heels of our own ambition. We are more than willing as a society to throw away much of what was fought for in the past for an immediate meager gain. The word "equality" is now laden with conditions of personal convenience and whim. So it seems that all the feather ruffling over our apparent moral bankruptcy should instead be aimed toward the shifting definition and thirst for "equality."

We'll never get enough of it.

Equality in America today is the Opium War of the mid-1900's in China. A drug that is as infectious as it is addicting. But unfortunately we can't just go out and buy a kilo of equality.

What started with the Boston Tea Party has gone through race, women's suffrage and religion and is slowing to a halt at the base of the varying personal opinion.

This, like the road sign for "blasting zone," should read "road closed."

With millions of opinions on what is "equal" and "fair" in society, what makes Merriam-Webster right and you wrong?

Here lies the jibe and pretense of fairness, everyone likes the ideas of equality, but people are never content enough with life to actually agree on equality.

It must have been tradition that told the guy to drive, open doors, always pay and don't forget to pamper. But where is the equality in that? If women are so concerned about being the vogue "independent woman" of today. Then I know some guys who wouldn't mind a little pampering.

Equality for the masses used to be the tried and true goal for America. But now, in a time devoid of the major travesties and injustices of the past, the focus is quickly becoming more subjective.

Whether people concern themselves with the pish-posh of who got the bigger slice of pizza isn't the "equality" I'm talking about. But it sure would be nice if once in a while, I wasn't the one driving to the movies.

Zach is a freshman in business. You can e-mail him at zach_hauser@yahoo.com.

TO THE EDITOR

Glover's remark upsetting

Editor,

I would like to extend my gratitude to the Union Program Council for bringing "A Night with Martin Luther King and Langston Hughes" to campus. Felix Justice's performance was phenomenal and his portrayal of King was moving. The poetry of Langston Hughes was thought-provoking as well as fun.

Danny Glover brought the poet to life in the expression of his work. The theme for the evening was love of humanity for one another. I took my 14-year-old daughter and her friend, and although parts of the speech were a little hard for her to understand, it is my hope that seeds for love and understanding of people different from her were planted in her heart and mind for her future.

However, for those of us who stayed for the question and answer period, there was a third performance. Our heads were snapped to attention as Danny Glover became quite aggressive with one of the people asking questions.

I felt like the personal attack on the woman who asked the question was unwarranted. It certainly affected my daughter's attitude toward Glover. To the woman who asked the question, I would say "I admire the guts it took to stand up there and ask the question, and I get the feeling he's been asked that question before, don't you?"

And to Glover I would say, "practice what you preach."

Deadline to change electronic identifications nears

By Edie Hall
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

As easy as it may be to remember your initials and a four-number sequence, K-Staters soon will be able to customize their electronic IDs, or eIDs, to something that better suits them.

From Feb. 3 through 28, students will be able to change their eIDs. Students may, however, keep their current eIDs if they wish.

With the new system, students will have only one sign-in name and password to log on to such things as WebMail, KATS and K-State Online, Rebecca Gould, director of iTAC, said.

At first, the eIDs will be used for central information technology resources such as WebMail and personal Web pages, Gould said. However, there is a timeline to integrate eIDs into other K-State sites.

"One of the important uses will be in SGA-associated voting," Gould said. "That should be set up by February 25. Students will be able to use the eID and password and vote for student body president and all the other offices. The way they'll verify that they are K-State students is through their eID and password."

March 10 is the goal for the KATS system to use the new eIDs, and officials hope they will be integrated into K-State Online in May. Gould said there is also hope that local area networks in individual colleges at K-State will use the eIDs in the future.

Since Jan. 9, students have needed their eIDs to gain access to all centrally managed computing labs, said Chuck Gould, project manager for the K-State enterprise authentication system.

"We wanted to make sure the resources are used only by K-Staters – we had other than K-Staters using the labs," she said. "Other universities do the same thing."

When students want to use a computer in a centrally managed lab, they will have to log in and change their password before Feb. 12.

After students have changed their passwords, they can log out and back in with their new passwords and will then have access to the World Wide Web.

If these steps aren't followed, however, users will be considered a guest and will only be able to access K-State Web pages, Gould said.

Unlike the old system, students now will be able to retain their eIDs for life, as long as the student uses his or her account at least once every five years, Chuck Gould said.

"Previously, when an individual left the university, their old ID would be recycled after about a year," Chuck Gould said. "We felt like it was important to give an opportunity to retain a tie to K-State."

Because students will be able to keep the eIDs for life, Rebecca Gould suggested they be careful in deciding on their new eID and choose something tasteful.

Although the actual implementation of the new system has taken about a year, the project has been discussed for nine to 10 years, said Elizabeth Unger, vice provost for Academic Services and Technology.

The project involved the help of Computing and Network Services and iTAC.

Unger said she was excited to take a step toward providing information in a way that allows students to generate new knowledge in a better way.

"The idea that this can become a much more robust learning environment for students than it is now excites me," Unger said. "Students are finally going to have IDs for their mail that make them feel comfortable so they can become individuals in a very real sense."

Health insurance rates surge; insurance officials link increase to varied causes

By Amy Link
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

About 25 percent of students are without health insurance.

And if the current trend of increasing premiums continues, more Kansans could find themselves without it.

Mary Beth Brutton, public information coordinator for Blue Cross and Blue Shield of Kansas, said the company has been trying to generate dialogue among consumers, health care providers, lawmakers, and physicians and is offering informational booklets.

"Our primary reason was to let Kansans know why health insurance is going up," she said.

There are three main reasons for the increase, Brutton said, including increases in the use of technology, prescription drug prices and the services customers demand.

Because of this, insurance companies are forced to increase everyone's premiums.

The increase in technology has generated with an increase in medical expenses, Brutton said.

For example, in the past, an X-ray would have been the only treatment. Now, however, there are more options, including the use of an MRI.

In addition, Brutton said insurance companies would prefer limiting the number of tests to those that would make the best diagnosis.

"We're not against technology, all we're saying is if the MRI is the best option, then just do that and not the X-ray," she said.

Dr. Jay Reppert, medical director at Lafene Health Center, said he would agree that doctors and patients could work together to eliminate cost, but that will not go without affecting a patient's care.

As a result, he said, doctors could do one test and then if the patient experiences more problems, they should schedule a follow-up appointment.

However, Reppert said getting people to follow-up can be a problem.

"Some people tend to think if problems persist it is something bad and are afraid to find out what it is," he said.

Aside from the lack of follow-up, another problem is that medicine relies on many tests, Reppert said.

"Medicine is not an exact science," he said. "If we don't do a test the first time, they may be angry at us for not doing it earlier."

In addition, the fear of malpractice suits has caused doctors to use more tests, and as a result, insurance and doctor's fees have increased, Reppert said.

Because of increased premiums, many students after graduation will be without health insurance for the first time, Brutton said. In addition, she said young people choose not to buy insurance because they believe they don't need it – a thought that could become risky.

"You can get by without health insurance for the common cold," she said. "You buy health insurance for catastrophic events."

Reppert said Lafene provides a plan for students through the Kansas Board of Regents. Although the plan is more cost-efficient for students, it is still increasing in price, he said.

Last semester, the plan cost $257 and increased to $403 for the spring semester.

Carol Kennedy, director of health education at Lafene Health Center, said that even though health insurance is expensive, it is very important for students without insurance to find a way to get it.

"Students should find ways to fit insurance into their budget," she said. "We all have auto insurance, and that's just your car – not your life."

Cats shut down NU with solid defense

By Sean Purcell
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It must have been one crystal clear halftime message from Coach Jim Wooldridge.

So good that it sparked K-State to a 77-53 blowout over Nebraska on Wednesday night in Bramlage Coliseum.

"There were no smiles while we were in the locker room," junior guard Jarrett Hart said. "Coach talked, and we listened."

K-State was up 33-28 entering the locker room after 20 minutes of play – but that was only because Hart hit a buzzer-beating 3-pointer before the intermission.

"We knew it would be a dogfight all night," senior forward Matt Siebrandt said. "In the second half, we just defended and rebounded better."

That, and Nebraska helped by coming out flat.

"It was like we lost focus or we lost effort," Husker guard Nate Johnson said. "They smelled that and just attacked it."

Nebraska shot just 28.6 percent in the second half – a statistic that included not a single 3-point shot.

The Huskers' poor shooting was a direct result of good defensive pressure from Siebrandt and center Pervis Pasco. The duo held Nebraska's tandem of big men to just 12 total points, while scoring in double figures, 18 and 15, respectively.

Pasco added 13 rebounds to book his eighth double-digit rebounding effort of the season. The double-double was his sixth of the year.

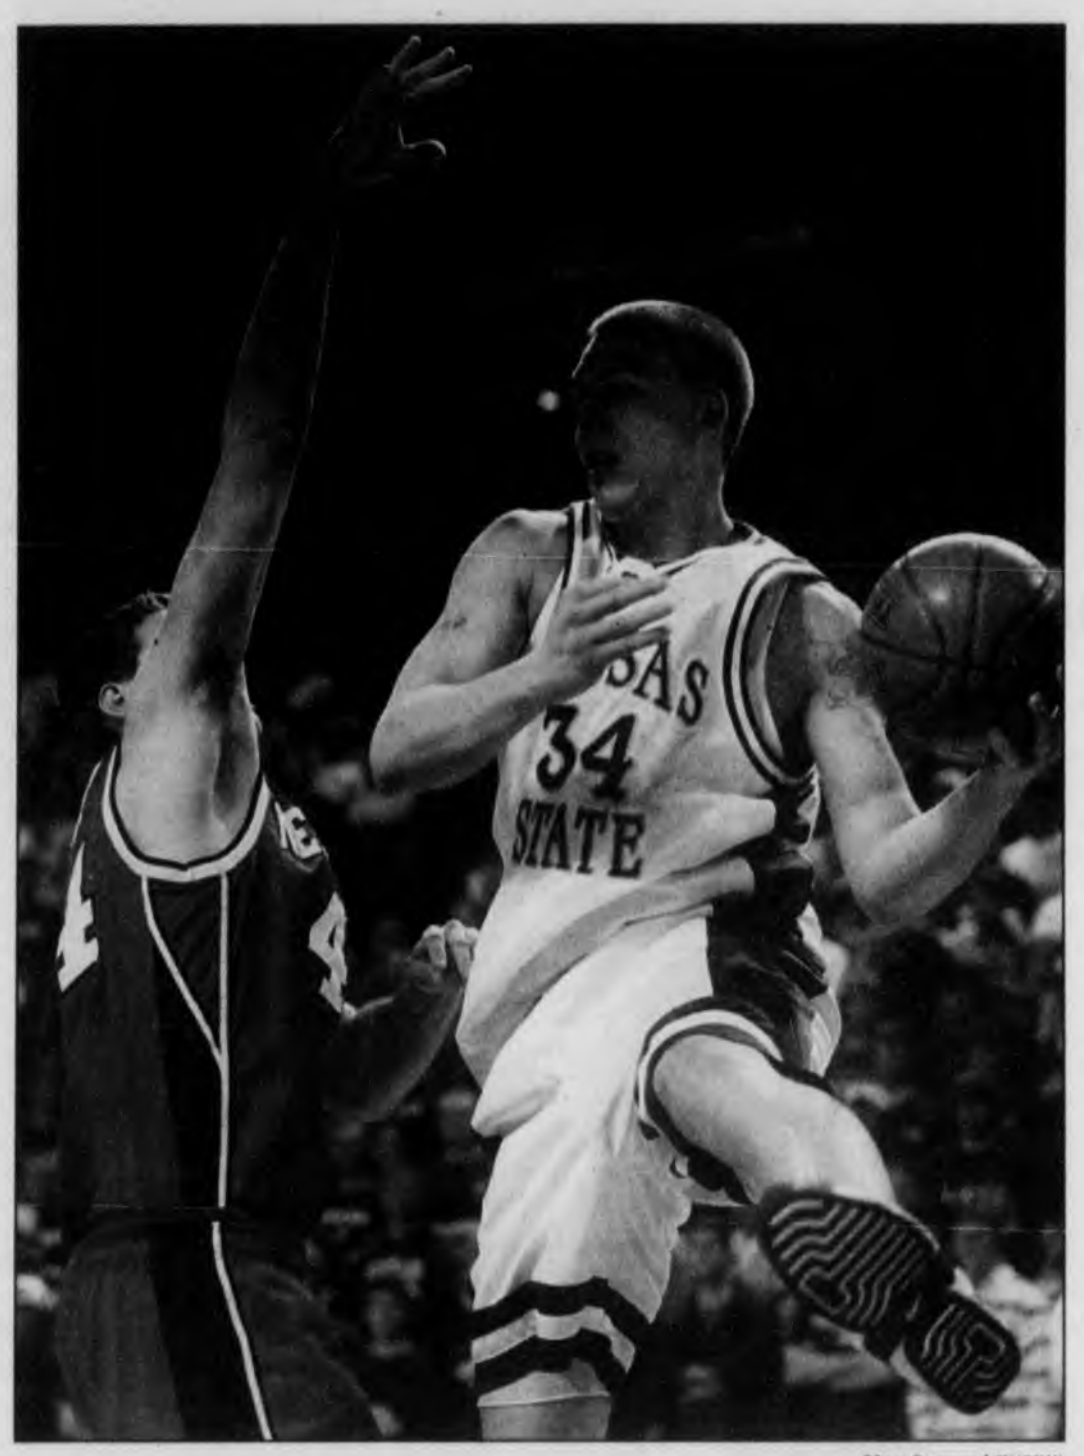
"They get on us about rebounding every day in practice," Pasco said, "so that's always a key thing to do in each game."

Pasco's exclamation point came on a Hart feed at the 4:58 mark. The senior glided to the hoop for a dunk, was fouled by the Huskers' Roy Enright and hit the ensuing free throw.

"The guards were getting good penetration, and we got good angles to the basket," Pasco said. "I just tried to stay composed and do what I needed to do to help this team."

K-State's 24-point blowout was the largest victory in the series since 1987, when the Wildcats breezed by Nebraska 114-82.

Wooldridge said the key to the night's romp was defense.



"I thought early in the ballgame Nebraska popped us pretty good," he said. "As the game went on, I thought we defended better, rebounded the ball and were a lot more scrappy.

"We didn't want them to penetrate our defense into the lane for fouls, short jump shots, or layups – the shooting percentage indicates we did a good job of that."

In just four Big 12 games, K-State has held two opponents to 32-percent shooting or less. Additionally, K-State avoided a three-game losing streak with the win.

"I wouldn't call it a statement, we just played our game," freshman forward Marques Hayden said.

"We knew what we needed to do and we did it."

Wildcat forward returns to dominate form in post

When the Wildcats began conference play, senior forward Matt Siebrandt was coming off three straight double-digit scoring games.

Then he fell into a slump, scoring 17 a combined points during the first three games of conference play, including a scoreless performance against Texas Tech.

But on Wednesday night against Nebraska, Siebrandt broke out of his slump, finishing the game with 18 points and six rebounds.

"I just took advantage of the opportunities," Siebrandt said. "It was one-on-one, and I felt I was a little quicker than those guys. They were pretty easy shots for me – high percentage shots. I was making them, and I am just glad I could help the team get off to a good start."

Forward Marques Hayden said that when Siebrandt plays well, K-State plays better on offense.

"Siebrandt played his game tonight," he said. "He can really utilize the moves he does best. That's Matt Siebrandt basketball.

"But I think at the same time, one of the most important things Matt Siebrandt does for this team is keep the offensive flow," Hayden said. "We're a team that likes to go inside-out and he's a main man that can really get the ball to the guards."

Coach Jim Wooldridge said Siebrandt's presence in the blocks was key to the Wildcats' 77-53 victory.

"Early on, Matt's aggressiveness was why he was able to score," he said. "He was just attacking his guy and getting it to the basket, and the end result is that he made shots."

Sweaters a better fit than mascot costumes

I stood in my bedroom Wednesday morning naked as a jaybird looking for an acceptable outfit to combat the snow.

It was cold, so I ruffled through my sweaters looking for something warm before settling on a green-and-tan striped number that accentuates the pecs I don't have.

DAN SMITH

But what I wanted to wear wasn't there.

Being the sports guy I am, on cold mornings I've often wondered how warm mascot uniforms really are. The Syracuse Orangemen's get-up, in particular, looks warm, waterproof and easy to launder.

I figured the uniform, coupled with the exercise I would get from students asking me to raise their spirits by doing stunts, seemed like a can't-miss endeavor.

So when I arrived at the Collegian to put together today's sports page, I hopped online to see how much a similar outfit would set me back.

To my dismay, I didn't have much luck finding the Syracuse garb, but I did find one site dedicated to the mascot trade.

The Spirit Mall, at www.dancecheer.net/dirmascots.html, is a popular one-stop shop for dance, drill team, cheerleading, colorguard, baton twirling and performing groups.

I figured it'd also be a good starting point for my treasure hunt.

But scanning the site, I was shocked and appalled at this seemingly innocent company's claims.

"Spetz Productions has been a leader among mascot companies since 1973," the site read. "We designed many of the modern techniques now used by everyone from world-wide companies to kindergartens."

Kindergartens?

If I'm going to wear a mascot suit on campus, and in the process raise the spirits of thousands of students, I certainly don't want to be using techniques that kindergartens already have perfected. I'd like to be professional about it, thanks.

Undeterred, I read on.

"Our mascot uniforms only weigh 10-12 lbs., compared to an industry average of 20-35 lbs.," the site read.

The best parkas on the market seem to weigh under three pounds. At this point, I was becoming a bit skeptical.

I then began worrying about my life when I read, "our mascots last 5-10 years, standard."

But I figured I'm in good physical condition, so I'd probably last a little longer anyway.

Then, the site read, "we use only the finest fabrics and furs."

I decided I would feel bad knowing an animal died for my right to wear a permanent smile and oversized shoes, even if it was to stay warm on those short walks to campus.

Dejected, I decided my sweater was probably a good-enough fit.

I guess I'll leave it to Willie to keep K-Staters in the right mood.

Spring intramural deadlines near; basketball teams forming fast

Recreational Services prepares for season

By Wes Marfield
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State's men's and women's basketball teams have been in action since early November, but the rest of the student body gets its chance starting today during Recreational Services' intramural season.

"Basketball is our most popular team sport," Assistant Director of Intramurals, John Wondra, said. "We had 346 teams entered last year."

Entry forms for some sports, like basketball, 4-wall handball doubles, 4-wall racquetball doubles, table tennis doubles and wallyball doubles are due today at 5 p.m. at the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex.

"They have to come into our business office and turn in their team entry form," Wondra said. "They then sign up for a time and pay the fees, which are $15 plus tax."

Entry fees for doubles competition is $1 per person plus tax.

Once a team turns in their entry form, they are assigned to a time slot and a division based on the make-up of their squad. Since time slots fill up fast, teams who turn their forms in early have an advantage.

"The sooner they turn their forms in, the better chance they have of making it into a time slot that works for all team members," Wondra said.

There are four divisions for men's basketball competition: fraternity, residence hall, independent and a six-feet and under division. There is also a single, combined women's division and a co-rec division.

The independent men's division is traditionally the most competitive, with 120

College Basketball | Conradt wins 800th

Texas' Jody Conradt became just the second women's basketball coach to win 800 games, reaching that milestone Wednesday night when the 17th-ranked Longhorns beat No. 7 Texas Tech 69-58.

Stacy Stephens had 16 of her 20 points in the second half, and Heather Schreiber had 15 points and a career-high 15 rebounds as Texas (12-4, 5-0 Big 12) snapped Tech's 15-game winning streak and stayed in first place in the conference.

College Basketball | OU-Tech reviewed

Big 12 officials are reviewing video of Texas Tech's 69-64 overtime loss at No. 7 Oklahoma to try to determine whether there was a glitch in the game clock during the final seconds of regulation.

Television replays of the Monday night game, which was broadcast by ESPN, show that two pauses on the clock may have affected the final seven seconds of the second half and given Oklahoma extra time before a game-tying shot that forced overtime.

The outcome of the game cannot be reversed.

MLB | Marlins sign All-Star Rodriguez

Ivan Rodriguez says he's healthy, and the Florida Marlins must agree.

The Marlins expanded their payroll Wednesday by signing the 10-time All-Star catcher to a $10 million, one-year contract.

Rodriguez played 1,479 games with the Texas Rangers, hitting .303 with 215 homers and 829 RBIs.

The Rangers refused to offer the 31-year-old Rodriguez salary arbitration last December in a payroll-slashing moving.

MLB | Baseball to discuss Expos' sale

Baseball's committee on the future of the Montreal Expos will meet Tuesday with the mayors of the District of Columbia and Portland, Ore., and a day later with officials from Northern Virginia to explain their expectations for later presentations to attract the team.

Baseball officials hope to have a decision by midsummer on where the Expos will play in 2004, but commissioner Bud Selig last week refused to give a timetable.

NHL | Sakic out 2 to 4 weeks

Colorado Avalanche captain Joe Sakic will be out two-to-four weeks because of a broken right foot.

Sakic was injured in the second period of Monday night's 1-1 tie against Dallas when he was hit by a shot from Sergei Zubov. Sakic returned to the ice and finished the game, notching an assist for the seventh straight game.

Sexual dysfunction affects people of all ages; more solutions exist for men than for women

By Amy Link
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It may be a common problem, but it is not a common conversation.

Sexual dysfunction affects people every day, yet most people are reluctant to discuss it due to embarrassment or insecurity.

Sexual dysfunction can be caused by both physical or emotional problems. Dorinda Lambert, associate director of counseling services and licensed psychologist, said lack of sexual desire can be caused by many things. She said it could be illness, depression or relationship conflicts.

"People should examine their relationships – what is the strength of the relationship, and what has changed in the relationship," Lambert said.

Lambert said it is important for people to take an inventory of their lives in order to help make a diagnosis. She said it may not be the relationship, but it could be things they are doing to themselves.

Too much pressure, too much caffeine, not getting enough sleep or not eating right can all lead to lack of sexual desire. There is no one answer, and it could be something else entirely, she said.

"Sometimes the plumbing just doesn't work," Lambert said.

Being too tired, or consuming too much alcohol also can contribute to sexual dysfunction, Lambert said.

The inability to achieve an erection is called erectile dysfunction and is a physical problem for males. According to the National Institute of Health, male patient visits regarding ED have increased from 7.7 per 1,000 visits in 1985 to 22.3 per 1,000 visits in 1999.

Physical problems are more common in males 65 and older, but younger males are not immune to it. Although chances of ED do increase with age, it is not impossible for young men to have ED. Treatments like Viagra are available and are becoming more common.

While men have solutions, there is not a female version of it, Kristy Dressman, licensed practical nurse at The Women's Health Group, said. The most common complaint among women is a decrease in libido, she said.

"Most of the women we see are middle aged, but not all of them," Dressman said. "Sometimes anti-depressants are used to deal with stress causing the problem."

Lambert said a side effect of anti-depressants can be sexual dysfunction, but that can be fixed by switching to another anti-depressant.

According to the National Institute of Health, some of the female biological problems can be hormonal imbalances, infections or diseases, such as diabetes or multiple sclerosis. These can cause pain during sex or excessive dryness.

It is important for sufferers of sexual dysfunction to remember it could be psychological or physical, so it is hard to make a diagnosis on their own, Lambert said.

"Because the mind and body are so connected, it would be difficult for a person to know what exactly their problem is," she said.

Lambert said people should consult a physician, and if the doctor feels the problem may be psychological, they can refer them to a counselor to get further assistance.

There are, however, some preliminary steps people can take on their own, Lambert said. People need to communicate between their partners about concerns in their relationships. These concerns could be the reason for the lack of desire.

She said people may need to set the mood or find ways to make themselves more aroused.

She said her advice for students would be to examine their lives and look at what may have changed that could have caused the problem.

"Look at your relationship. If you're feeling abused or used, then that may be why you don't have the desire," Lambert said.

Lack of sexual desire

How erectile dysfunction affects men:

Erectile dysfunction (ED) is the repeated inability to get or keep an erection firm enough for sexual intercourse.

- ED affects 15 to 30 million American men.
- ED usually has a physical cause.
- ED is treatable at all ages.

Treatments include psychotherapy, drug therapy, vacuum devices and surgery.

Conditions that affect women's sexual functions:

- Pregnancy: In most cases, sexual activity doesn't change during pregnancy, but it can.
- Menopause: The lack of estrogen creates vaginal dryness, many women experience a loss of desire, difficulty getting aroused and painful intercourse.
- Cancer: Women often fear cancer will affect their sex life. The disease can create concerns about injury or partner rejection. Radiation and chemotherapy also contribute to a lack of energy.
- Chronic illness: Diabetes, arthritis or heart disease can have an impact on a women's self image and ability to feel sexual.
- Male factor: If a male partner is having sexual difficulties, pleasure for both partners can be affected.

Economics key to Manhattan growth

Surges in sales, development create optimism with city leaders

By Crystal Welborn
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Manhattan is growing, and as a result, sale surges are contributing to the city's increasing revenue.

Lyle Butler, president and CEO of Manhattan Area Chamber of Commerce, said several Manhattan businesses reported an increase of sales in the first two weeks of January and is optimistic that sales will continue to be high.

"If people see some positive changes in the local economy, it helps them feel good about the future and more willing to spend money," he said.

Butler said he attributes some of the sale surge to the return of K-State students.

"K-State students have an effect on the economy, and returning students always bring a sale surge," he said. "There's a definite economic impact when classes are in session."

Tracy Turner, professor in economics, said when the local economy is good, students benefit.

"Businesses hire KSU students and if those businesses are selling things, they may hire more students or increase pay," she said.

Butler said that besides employment opportunities, additional sales help local governments to function properly.

"When consumers are spending money, they are paying sales tax and those sales tax revenues help pay city and county government," he said.

Butler said the future of Manhattan business looks good because of the new businesses opening, as well as surrounding counties coming to Manhattan to shop.

"If we look down the road, new jobs and places for people to spend their money are opening," he said. "Manhattan is becoming a real shopping center."

Cheryl Sieben, director of the Aggieville Business Association, said Aggieville is benefiting from new businesses as well.

"There are a lot of new businesses and businesses looking to come in--we only have a little space available and that's good," she said. "I feel the retail climate in Aggieville is good right now, there is always some uncertainty, but things are looking good."

Butler said 11 surrounding counties use Manhattan as the hub of retail shopping in the area.

"With the opening of the new Home Depot, not only are community members shopping, but people from other cities as well," he said.

Allen Raynor, general manager of Manhattan Town Center, said that although the Town Center is only responsible for renting space, it still plays a role in increasing the sales of its businesses.

"We continue to provide a safe environment and programs to bring people into the mall. Hopefully, they will spend some money while they are here," he said.

Raynor said that although the sales in the mall are up about four percent from last year, the numbers are still not rising as quickly as they have in previous years.

"We can't predict if sales will increase. All we can do is hope people continue to come to the mall for their shopping needs," he said.

While the economy is seeing improvements right now, Butler said consumers need to continue spending in order for the economy to grow.

"People are finding that because the economy has never been softer, retail prices are lower and interest rates are lower," he said. "People are motivated by bargains right now, and they still need to purchase goods."

High turn-over rate helps students find work

By James Hurla
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

T.J. Hudson applied at 32 different places before he finally landed a job.

"It's such a relief," he said. "It's not even funny."

Hudson's résumé included about three years of experience in telemarketing, but it was not enough to impress potential employers.

Hudson, 19, is taking a semester off from K-State, but had been searching for about six months for a job.

Mike Sexton, job service manager at the Manhattan Work Force Center, said Hudson's long search probably isn't indicative of a lack of jobs for students.

"There are jobs available," Sexton said.

Riley County's unemployment rate in November was 2.9 percent, but this statistic doesn't take into account students looking for part-time jobs, according to Kansas' human resources Web site.

Sexton said there weren't specific numbers available to describe the part-time job market, but Manhattan usually has a wealth of work for students.

Typically, more jobs become available at the beginning of the fall semester because of the transient nature of the job market in a college town, Sexton said. But there are jobs available at almost any time during the year.

Hudson said, though, that he wasn't willing to take any job that came along.

"Pretty much the only limit I set was no fast food," he said.

So Hudson set out and applied at hotels, bowling alleys and retail stores. He said he was called in to start training at one job, but was notified upon his arrival that the job had been given to someone else.

"It was frustrating," he said. "Being a poor college student, being broke, was probably the most frustrating part."

The most important thing to do in a job search is to actively search for jobs, said Debra Butler, who works in economic development at the Manhattan Area Chamber of Commerce.

"Pound pavement," she said. "Just get out there and knock on doors."

Posting a résumé with local agencies, such as the Manhattan Work Force Center, or checking the classified advertisements in the newspaper can be good ways to find jobs, she said.

Billie Evans, manager at Lee's Western Wear, posted an advertisement in Monday's Collegian, and had filled the position by Thursday from a pool of about a dozen applicants.

"Just hang in there," she said in support of those still looking for part-time jobs. "It's tough."

But Hudson said he was tired of having to persevere in the job market.

He finally found a job--at the coffee shop in the K-State Student Union.

"Today, it's just like -- 'finally,'" he said.

CLEARING A PATH

Evan Semón | COLLEGIAN
Collin Curry, freshman in architecture, shovels the sidewalk outside of the Sigma Phi Epsilon fraternity house after the morning snowstorm that left an inch of snow on the ground.

CATERING | Serving guests, creating table settings among duties

refilling food and drinks when needed and clearing the room when the event is finished. For each five-hour shift, the employee gets to eat the meal being served.

"If you don't like to work a lot, but you like to eat a lot, it's a good job," Randall said.

Setup for a dinner includes setting tables with plates, silverware, salads, rolls and sometimes desserts. Setup usually takes about two hours. Then students stay to serve the main courses and refill drinks until the dinner ends. Cleaning up lasts an hour.

Edwin Sama, graduate student in political science, said he likes the atmosphere and flexibility of working for Union catering.

"It is not stressful at all," said Sama, who has been working with the catering department for two years. "It works around my academic schedule and the hours are really flexible. Plus, I like my coworkers and have fun working here. I guess that's what it is all about."

Union catering also sponsors the Bluemont Buffet, a buffet line for special occasions or events in the Union Ballroom.

Employees help to decorate for the theme buffets, which have included a Halloween buffet, a western buffet and back-to-school buffet. Soeken said students are given more free reign to use their creativity when decorating for buffets.

"It is a fun atmosphere, and I think the crew really enjoys working together," Soeken said. "They get to work all the interesting, different events. We have served presidents and vice presidents. As part of the Landon Lecture Series, we have served many dignitaries from all over the country and the world."

Both Sama and Felicia Grafals, sophomore in special education, said they have been able to meet some interesting people through serving dinners and banquets, including President Jon Wefald and football Coach Bill Snyder.

"For a first job, it has given me more opportunities for when I graduate," Grafals said. "If I don't find a position in the field I am graduating in, I know I can can always find a position here."

Serving banquets, tailgates, wedding receptions and scholarship dinners, students who work for the catering department have the opportunity to be a part of many functions on campus.

Beyond being part of campus, Grafals said she feels like she is part of a family working for the catering department.

"I enjoy it because the people are so nice," Grafals said. "We're all a big family. If someone is moving or something, we go help out. Even if it is not business related, we all go hang out with each other. My boss has a Christmas party for us every year. We are able to all just get together and relax."

teams entered last year.

Basketball games begin Jan. 28. Each team will play once a week for six weeks. There will be a single-elimination tournament for each division.

Drew Vining, freshman in open-option and intramural manager on Haymaker Hall's third floor, said he's looking forward competition.

"Basketball will be a lot of fun," Vining said. "We're getting some new guys that wouldn't play other sports."

In addition to the physical activity, intramurals offer several other benefits to students.

"It's a good way to meet new people, have fun and run off some energy," Vining said.

In February, a whiffleball tournament, a wristwrestling meet and a free throw competition will be held. Entries for whiffleball and the free throw competition will be accepted from Feb. 3 through 6 and wristwrestling entries from Feb. 10 through 13.

All members of division winning teams or individual/dual champions receive a T-shirt.

After spring break, a second session of sports will begin competition, featuring more outdoor activities.

FIRST LADY | Cook's wife to spend semester in Prague

Zac and Mary are strong supporters of the international programs offered at K-State, through which they met two women from Argentina.

The two international students persuaded Zac and Mary to honeymoon there.

"The main reason we went to Argentina was because we were international buddies with two girls from Argentina, and they had to go home Christmas Eve and they weren't here for the wedding. They were always saying we needed to see their homes, so we went," Mary said.

Though Mary has to be away from Zac for most of his term, she said she is looking forward to her trip abroad.

"I have always wanted to study abroad and I never did, so this is my chance to do it," she said.

blood a day.

No additional blood drives can be scheduled to combat the shortage because the region's staff is maxed out with current drives.

"All we can do for now is encourage all eligible donors to donate," Cox said. "Only 5 percent of the eligible population gives blood and we would like to see that number change. It only takes one hour and it literally saves lives. It is a whole world of good condensed into one hour."

Qualified donors can donate once every 56 days. For more information on donating, call 1-800-GIVE-LIFE.

SIEBRANDT
Senior forward sparks Wildcats

Siebrandt scored the Wildcats' first eight points and finished the half with 10. He opened the second half much like the first, scoring four points in the first minute.

"He got us off to a good start," he said.

"We've seen Matt do this before, where he comes out, and generally speaking, if he gets off to a good start, he's going to have a good game."

"We needed him out there," Wooldridge said. "The way they defend, we were able to get a few early opportunities that he cashed in for us."

Siebrandt said he couldn't explain why he started each half with such a hot hand.

"It just happened that way," Siebrandt said.

"Teammates got me good shots, and it's my job to knock them down."

Siebrandt finished eight of nine from the floor, but the miss was a 15-foot jump shot at 46 seconds left in the first half.

The shot, Wooldridge said, did not make him too happy.

"I'd rather not see him shoot that," he said, "and I'd think you'd feel the same way."

WARRANT | Search underway

it shows a hit on that database. Then they are taken into custody, and we begin a process of getting them brought back to Riley County for prosecution."

Grubbs said the department assigns police officers to different sectors based on violators' last known residential and sometimes work addresses.

"We're not going to necessarily be bound by a particular sector, but there will probably be approximately 10-15 warrants per officer," he said.

Grubbs said workers at the jail are also prepared for an influx.

"We'll be working closely with the city prosecutor and the county attorney as well," he said. "It may take some unique scheduling in court, based on the number of people arrested and brought in."

Riley County Attorney Bill Kennedy said the program is a day to handle unfinished work. He said warrants can be issued for felonies, misdemeanors or for other crimes, including failure to appear in court and unpaid child support.

"All of these people who will be arrested tomorrow have warrants out, which means my work is done for the time being until they appear in court," he said.

"If they don't choose to bond out, they will appear in district court Friday at 1:30 p.m. on closed-circuit TV and will get the opportunity to make a request for a lower bond at that time."

Kennedy said those who pay the bond may not appear in court for two to three weeks.

"Bond out cases go on a slower track," he said. "We'll be ready, though."

Powell voices confidence

Secretary of State says U.S. would not have to fight Iraq without support

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON – Facing European resistance, Secretary of State Colin Powell said Thursday the United States would be able to put together a strong coalition if it decided to go to war with Iraq.

"I don't think we will have to worry about going it alone," he said.

Powell also raised hopes that Germany and France, skeptical of using force to disarm Iraq, might reach a consensus with the United States in the U.N. Security Council after inspectors report next week on their searches for hidden weapons.

"We listen to others and we find a way forward," Powell said at the State Department as he held talks with Foreign Secretary Jack Straw of Britain.

In fact, he said, while the Bush administration feels a new U.N. resolution to authorize force probably is unnecessary, it is keeping an open mind because many Security Council nations "would prefer to see a second resolution if it comes to the use of military force."

In Berlin, German Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder said he could never accept the idea that war is inevitable.

"This is a common position of France and Germany, and we will not be diverted from it," Schroeder said.

Foreign Minister Joschka Fischer said Germany would try to arrange to have the weapons inspectors report again after Monday. And in Athens, Greece, Russian Foreign Minister Igor Ivanov said there was not enough evidence from the inspections to justify military intervention.

"We want to hope that no country will take unilateral action outside of U.N. resolutions," Ivanov said. "If that happens Russia will do all that is necessary to return the process to the diplomatic path."

President Bush spoke by telephone with Russian President Vladimir Putin about cooperation on Iraq, the White House said. The Kremlin said Putin told Bush "the main criterion" in assessing the situation should be the inspectors' findings.

Powell and other administration officials left little doubt that Bush was moving closer to a decision to go to war – with U.N. support or without it.

Deputy Secretary of Defense Paul Wolfowitz, seeking support from the Council on Foreign Relations, told the private group in New York that disarming Iraq is critical to the war on terrorism.

Wolfowitz said the administration was providing weapons inspectors with "names of individuals whom we believe it would be productive to interview," and give information.

Rec Complex, tutoring services see interest increase this month

Strengthening the mind as well as the body seemed to be concerns of students when they started making New Year's resolutions earlier this month.

Connie Grunstad, assistant director of the Chester E. Peters Recreational Complex, said the spring semester increase in numbers at the complex is nothing new. After all, this is often the busiest week of the year for the complex.

"Typically, our highest attendance date for the Rec Complex is the Tuesday after Martin Luther King Day," Grunstad said.

With 4,360 total visits logged Tuesday, attendance at the Rec Complex exceeded the numbers logged on the first weekday back at school last semester by 2,271 people. Of course, Grunstad said those numbers could be attributed to other circumstances as well.

"Whether or not it's because of New Year's resolutions I don't know. We don't question people when they come in," she said. "It's also cold outside so people don't want to work out in this weather."

Tiffany Bullard, fitness consultant at the Rec Complex, said the consultants have been booked solid every day this

Pentagon calls for 200 soldiers

By James Hurla

About 200 members of the 937th Engineer Group at Fort Riley received deployment orders from the Pentagon on Thursday.

This unit is part of the III Armored Corps based at Fort Hood, Texas, which was recently deployed as part of "Task Force Ironhorse" for a possible ground war with Iraq.

Christie Vanover, deputy media relations officer at Fort Riley, said the soldiers will provide medical and logistic support for combat troops but will not be involved in combat.

"This movement of forces provides increased military capabilities in the ongoing war on terrorism," according to a press release the base sent Thursday.

Vanover declined to make comments regarding time of deployment or exactly what role the troops would play in President Bush's war on terror, citing security reasons.

Future deployments will not be announced until the orders are received at Fort Riley, Vanover said.

Student Senate elects Kasper with 30-8-8

By Amy Preston
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Student Senate members elected Maryelizabeth Kasper as their new vice chair with a 30-8-8 vote Thursday night.

Kasper, who previously served as a senator, was sworn in by Chair John O'Hara after former Vice Chair Vicki Conner resigned.

The newly-elected Kasper will finish the term, which concludes at the end of the spring semester.

Kasper said there were three reasons why she deserved to become the new vice chair, including her dedication, efficiency and organization.

"I have been active and I really believe in efficiency for the Student Senate," she said to a room full of Senate members. "I am really organized, and I've really put my heart and soul into being a vice chair."

In addition, Kasper's public relations role in Pack the Library Night and past leadership experiences left an imprint on a number of Senate members.

"If we needed something to get done for public relations, I knew Maryelizabeth was going to get it done," Academic Affairs Chair Seth Bridge said.

Senator Jeremy Stohs said the reason Kasper deserved the vice chair position over candidates Ben Procter and Sam Meier was simple.

"She's not stranger to taking over and filling vacancies," he said.

"She is the only candidate that has formal leadership in Senate and is familiar with the rules and responsibilities."

Student Senate

The following items were discussed at Thursday night's Student Senate meeting:

- Maryelizabeth Kasper was elected and sworn in as vice chair with a 30-8-8 vote
- Mark Threeton was approved as the elections commissioner for 2002-03
- Lisa Tirrell was sworn in as the new senate operations chair for the remainder of Senate's term
- A statutes amendment concerning election regulations unanimously passed

Computers, online notes prove helpful

By Kari Kennedy
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Trying to jot down every last word in a lecture can be tedious, but online notes can ease the pain.

Ann Stalheim-Smith, associate professor of biology, uses the Internet to post her lecture notes online for use by her students.

"I thought it was a good idea because the students would have a better set of notes," she said. "And in the course I teach there is so much info given that I thought it would be very valuable if they have a thorough set of notes."

Students having the notes beforehand allows more time to do active learning during the lecture, she said.

"I can have the students think about the material and discuss it."

Patricia Farley, junior in social science, said she likes how she can pay more attention during the lecture.

"I can focus more on what they're talking about rather than writing down word for word what they're saying," she said.

Jennifer Strong, sophomore in public relations, still prefers taking her own notes.

"I like the process of writing the notes down in my own handwriting and in my own words," she said.

Since it can be hard to take complete notes by hand, Stalheim-Smith said online notes are more accurate

"I think that the students have performed better on exams since I've started using the notes online," she said. "I have it organized and outlined so they can understand the road map of where I'm going, and they are actively involved," she said.

Online notes could be dangerous for those who are tempted to skip class.

"More people might be missing class because the notes are provided online," Farley said.

Stalheim-Smith said she keeps her notes slightly incomplete to encourage students to come to class.

"I find when I have the combination of online notes but leaving them incomplete, students are less likely to skip," she said. "I do think that students also did that before I went online, they just got notes from someone else."

Technology teaching tools have pros, cons

By Hannah Aboul-Hosn
DAILY COLLEGIAN

UNIVERSITY PARK, Pa. - While technology can be a useful resource in the classroom for students and professors, some problems still exist.

"The danger is people focusing so much on the technology aspect that they don't pay attention to the actual content," said Pennsylvania State University graduate teaching assistant Dave Jansson.

Last fall, Jansson had no need to post his class notes online until the last third of the semester, when the pace of the class picked up.

"I didn't want to encourage people to not show up and just rely on the notes on the Web site," he said.

But Michael Weinstein, professor of astronomy, posts his lecture notes on his class Web site.

Weinstein said he believes online class notes can lead to some students not attending lectures, but he stresses to his students that the Web site is only an outline.

"I try to tell students that the notes on the Web site are like the Cliffs Notes. Some things in the notes would be cryptic without the background explanation given in class," he said.

Weinstein said he likes using his course Web site to add to the lectures by posting his notes on the web.

"[Putting notes online] gives both students and professors more freedom," Weinstein said.

Jessica Rowland, communications freshman, said she thinks the use of online materials is great, especially in large classes where it's hard for students to ask questions.

It is harder to remember the ideas of the lessons when the notes aren't posted online, said Dana Rosenthal, division of undergraduate studies freshman.

"I like the notes online because when professors go really fast, you don't have to write everything down word for word and you can just go back later," Rosenthal said.

Students consider banks

Area institutions encourage research in banking

By Rogie Dorpinghaus
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Kate Rulifson is from North Carolina and believes it's more convenient to keep her financial institution there than mess with finding one in Manhattan.

Rulifson, sophomore in graphic design, said it gets expensive using the ATMs in Manhattan, but she is convinced it's more convenient than changing.

Convenience, services offered, and interest rates are some factors students should look for when picking out a financial institution, said Joyce Cantrell, human ecology professor and instructor of Personal and Advanced Finance.

"You have to know which banking characteristics are most important to you and do a little research," Cantrell said.

In Manhattan, banks offer a wide variety of services to their customers, including a number of ATMs around town.

"Commerce is a good bank for students because there are so many locations in so many of the students' hometowns," said David Paulsen, financial service representative of Commerce Bank.

Justin Hayes, junior in kinesiology, said he switched to Commerce Bank during college because he wanted to have accessibility at his hometown of Junction City and in Manhattan.

For Brian Smee, junior in engineering, convenience was also a key role in determining his current financial institution with Capitol Federal Savings.

"I wanted to have something so when I went home to visit my parents, I could bank at a location there, too," he said.

According to January rates, Kansas State University Federal Credit Union offered the best savings rates around Manhattan with 1.25 percent.

The credit union also offers a .75 percent interest rate on checking accounts if a minimum balance of $300 is maintained.

However, checking accounts with no minimum balance are available without interest or fees.

"Credit unions are not-for-profit organizations," Cantrell said.

"That is why they don't have to pay taxes, and how they can offer better rates than banks, because they are member-owned."

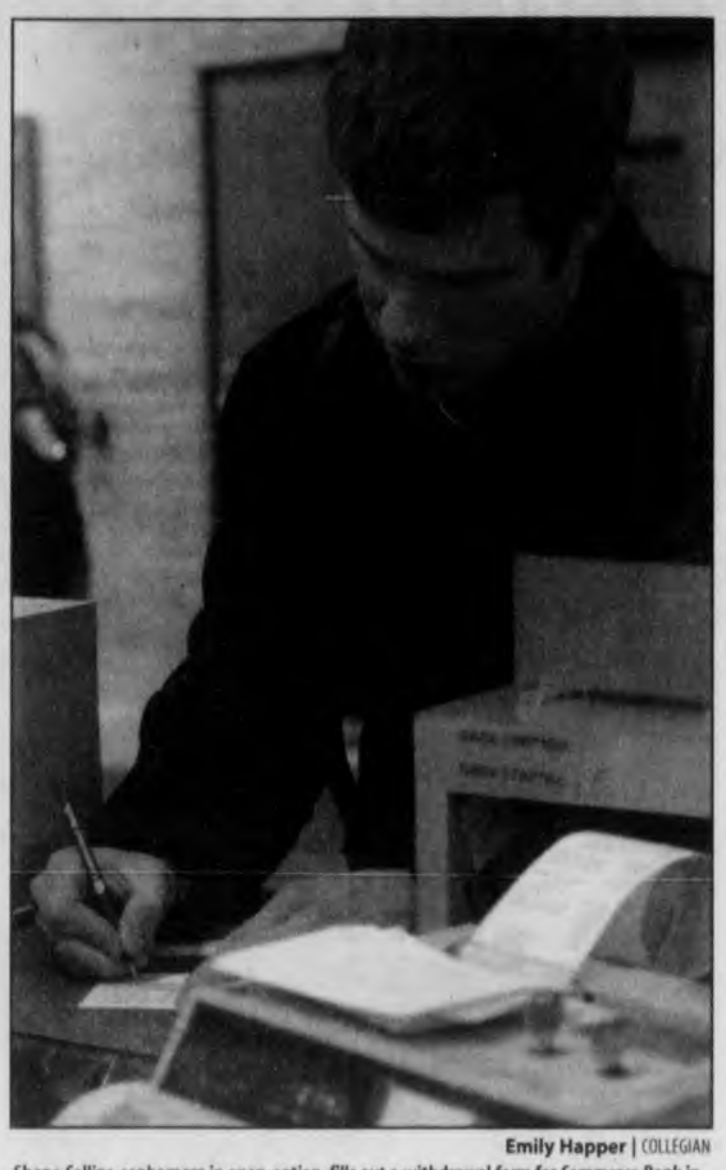
Cressyn McBee, accounting assistant at the credit union, said anybody can become a member if they or family members are associated through K-State, either as a student or faculty member.

Compared to other banks in Manhattan, KSU Federal Credit Union requires the second lowest amount to open an account, $25.

"Once you open an account, you actually own a part of the credit union which is why you're called a member," McBee said.

Commerce Bank offers students the option to obtain a University Account which doesn't have a minimum deposit requirement and has no minimum balance fees. The only requirement is a K-State student ID.

To open an account at other institutions, several banks in Manhattan require a valid driver's license and social security card. The financial institution will most likely check credit history before opening an account.



In addition, students without banking accounts can still cash checks for free at the institution the check is written from with a driver's license.

On the check, if it is a payroll or third party check, it will have some indication what financial institution it is written from. This information is usually found in the lower left-hand corner of the check.

In addition to cashing checks, students can also obtain cash through ATM machines.

However, students must understand how the machine works when withdrawing money from a machine, Cantrell said.

"Most people don't realize that when you get money out of an ATM with a credit card, you start paying interest on the cash withdrawn immediately," she said.

Debt increases after holidays

Expert offers advice to combat bills, avoid future problems

By James Hurla
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Ryan Weigel just wanted to do some Christmas shopping.

What he hadn't bargained for was starting a credit card debt that would snowball for nearly a year.

"I'm up to my eyebrows in debt," he said.

Credit card debt is often a problem early in the year, according to the National Foundation for Credit Counseling, because holiday shopping can be overwhelming.

However, it is important to know how to pay off the current balance and avoid further debt.

First, the National Foundation for Credit Counseling recommends to call creditors, tell them what happened, and try to negotiate the next payment or a lower interest rate.

A good credit and payment history might persuade the creditors to be more lenient.

Next, plan a budget. Overspending leads to debt, so plan all expenses and don't go beyond them.

"It was a lot of little Wal-Mart deals," he said of his debt.

"Most of my purchases were $20 or more – a lot of stupid things."

Finally, the foundation suggested seeking professional credit counseling.

This service is often low-cost or free, but it is important to research quality and safety of the service.

Some students, though, have managed to avoid the pitfalls of shopping on credit.

Rebecca Shaw, senior in elementary education, said she has been able to avoid credit card debt despite charging up to $700 each month.

By paying off the bill each month, students can avoid debt and build good credit, said Chris Burk, certified credit counselor from the foundation.

Creditors may not grant loans or mortgages to people with no credit history, Burk said, so charging expenses can be beneficial, as long as the bill is paid off and no interest is incurred.

However, some students prefer to avoid credit cards altogether.

Megan Sherlock, freshman in business administration, doesn't have any credit cards. She baby-sits for extra money, but is able to avoid the temptation to overspend because the option isn't there.

Burk said that people in credit counseling often are not allowed to have any credit cards during their counseling. During a session, counselors help negotiate a lower interest rate or lower minimum payment in exchange for assurance that their borrowers will not open a new credit account with another company.

Weigel has canceled all his credit cards, but not before he amassed about $6,000 in debt. He currently is paying 22 percent interest on his past purchases, and he said he is doing his best to pay off the debt.

Burk said he encourages people to avoid credit cards but understands the appeal of their convenience.

"It can be nice to only write one check a month," he said. "We really encourage debit cards, which take the money right out of your checking account – that way if it's not there, you can't spend it."

But ultimately, the decision whether to use a credit card is left to each individual, Burk said.

"It really depends on how disciplined a person is," he said.

Signs of debt crisis

- Behind on the basics, like rent and utilities
- Using credit to purchase what would normally be bought with cash or check, such as groceries
- Skipping some debt payments to make others
- Receiving overdue notices or telephone calls from bill collectors
- More than 20 percent of take-home pay being used to pay credit card debt

Talks between two Koreas slow down

By Hans Greimel
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

SEOUL, South Korea – South and North Korea agreed early Friday to peacefully resolve the international standoff over North Korea's nuclear programs, according to a joint declaration released after Cabinet-level talks.

But South Korea acknowledged it had not been able to draw any compromises from the North over its nuclear programs during the two days of talks in Seoul.

In the joint declaration, the two sides said they had "sufficiently exchanged" positions on the nuclear issue and "agreed to actively cooperate to resolve this issue peacefully."

Meanwhile, a top American diplomat visited Tokyo to strengthen international support for putting the issue before the U.N. Security Council.

The push comes as top officials in Washington say they detect a softening in North Korea's stance.

This week's Cabinet-level meetings in Seoul were the first in months between the two Koreas, and South Korea promised to make the a forum for insisting North Korea scrap nuclear programs that could make weapons.

The two sides agreed to hold the next round of talks April 7-10 in Pyongyang and another round of inter-Korean economic talks Feb. 11-14 in Seoul.

Both sides also pledged to work toward reconciliation on the Korean peninsula, which has been divided since 1945.

In a separate statement, the South Korean negotiators said they had been unable to win any compromises from the North. The South had been pressing the North to state specific steps for settling the international standoff peacefully.

OPINION

TO THE POINT

Smart banking requires care on students' part

Do your homework.

Banks are notorious for racking up fees from college students. If you overdraw your account, miss your loan payment, or if your savings account dips below the minimum limit, you can be charged. These fees can add up to costing you more than you anticipated.

Find a bank that suits your needs by asking questions. Ask them how much an overdraft fee is, or how much money you need to keep in your account to avoid extra costs.

Using an ATM that doesn't belong to your bank can cost you even more, sometimes up to $2. If it is your first time overdrawing your account, or if you weren't aware of the fees, don't be afraid to ask the customer service representative to cut you some slack. Most are willing to work with customers that may be having these problems.

The most important thing to remember is if your bank isn't treating you right, find one that will.

It's frickin' freezing outside.

Hey, Hauser, I got a good idea. Why don't you try to demean everyone in your articles? That would be nice.

Zach Hauser, why don't you spend less time sleeping with your dictionary and thesaurus and spend more time reading the content within. Use words that you know what they mean, buddy.

Can snot freeze?

If I was Paul Restivo, I'd probably giggle when I touched myself, too.

The story about the president getting married takes up half the front page. Maybe the fact that I'm single can take up a spot in the Fourum.

We've seen articles about Zac Cook's job. We've seen articles about Zac Cook's marriage. But where are the articles about Zac Cook's performance in office? Oh wait, he hasn't done anything.

I think there should be no more affirmative action.

Wearing a mascot costume? Dan Smith is an idiot. Bring back Joel Reichenberger.

Dan Smith is a disgrace to the print journalism students of A.Q. Miller school. Keep him in his mascot costume and out of the newspaper.

My roommates and I have decided that in order to attract more ladies, I'm going to start putting sexual lubricants in my hair instead of gel. By the way, it's peach flavored.

CUNNING CUTS

Sebelius' tricky methods still hurt schools

ANDREW LAWSON

Kathleen Sebelius, I've got to hand it to you.

You are a cunning woman and a canny politician.

The budget you presented last week – that was a real work of art.

You promised you wouldn't cut elementary and secondary education spending, and, indeed, your budget does maintain current levels of funding.

But you didn't do anything to help education. You committed a sin of neglect.

Governor Sebelius, what about the rising insurance costs that schools have to cover? Linda Jones, chief financial officer for USD 259 in Wichita, said the district's insurance costs will rise 10 to 15 percent next year.

It is almost certain the districts that can will raise their local property taxes as much as possible, but many districts have already done so. What about them?

And why are you changing the way the state distributes money to special education programs? Instead of funding on a per-teacher basis, you would base funding on student numbers and the severity of their disabilities.

This is almost certain to decrease state aid for special education. You would leave the schools to make up the difference out of their own pockets, since they are required by law to provide a certain level of funding for special ed.

Since you restored most of the money former Gov. Graves cut from social services, why don't you do the same with the $27-per-pupil cut he made to education? Is it because you get the benefit of the spending cut without being reviled for actually enacting it?

Also, tell me why you ever considered leaving the state with less than 1 percent of the budget in the ending-balance.

That reserve is all we have to fall back on if one single part of your budget is in error, or if revenues fall short of expectations.

Since revenues have done so for the last two years, why would you think this year will be any different? Indeed, the November projections you based the initial budget on have already proven to be optimistic. According to the Wichita Eagle, tax revenues already are $22 million short.

Your own budget director, Duane Goossen, said last year that even if everything works perfectly, a decision like this would damage the state's bond ratings, delay the state's payments, and risk the state's financial stability. And that's just if the reserve was dropped to 5 percent. Imagine what no reserve would do.

At least you realized your mistake and pledged to maintain more money in the ending-balance. Where, though, will the money come from?

Speaker of the House Doug Mays said that if you do not leave the balance at or near zero, then you must cut school funding or raise taxes, but you promised to do neither. Which promise will you break?

The no-new-taxes promise was both Tim Shallenburger's and your favorite phrase last fall, wasn't it?

How ironic it is, then, that no one complained about the $86 million in sales tax aid to local governments you discontinued. After all, you are all but forcing them to raise their only other source of revenue, local taxes, to compensate. Hey, isn't it peachy that they will get blamed for new taxes and not you?

After all, when Graves tried to withhold only $48 million in the same way, the local governments took him to court, and they haven't settled yet.

And what about those $9.1 million in new fees you announced? If the chief objection to taxes is the bite they take out of our wallets, why are Kansans grinning and bearing this? What's the old saying? A tax by any other name would stink as badly?

Many representatives and senators praised you for making hard choices. I think, however, that you made the easy choice – the decision to let others shoulder the blame for financial crunches. Such behavior is not going to help Kansas out of the current economic crisis.

So cut education, slash the ending-balance or raise taxes already. Quit dancing around the issue with stopgap measures.

Taking a proactive stance on diversity is a tiring, never-ending process

ANGEL WILSON

It's funny how diversity issues manage to appear in any situation.

Diversity is unique in that it is almost an oxymoron. It's nice to look at. Everyone wants to say they have it. Not everybody appears to really want it. What's with all the privileges? Why can't we just let things occur on their own accord?

There is an old song that says "don't push it, don't force it, let it happen naturally ..." The song was actually referring to love, but the idea is generally the same.

I bet I'm one of the last people anyone would expect to say let diversity happen on its own accord, huh? Well, times have changed and I want to sit down Rosa (maybe my feet are swollen and my legs are tired, too). It gets tiring being an advocate for something that so few people seem to have an interest in. I want to be like the other armchair activists and leave the hard decisions up to the politicians, I mean the wealthy, no, I mean the privileged.

Who cares, as long as the burden is off my own shoulders? I mean, what's the deal with all of this action? I say this because of the numerous initiatives and programs designed specifically to encourage and enhance diversity. Why does it take an initiative to encourage diversity? But I guess you wouldn't want an apple amongst oranges if you were at work or school because it'll just throw the taste off anyway, right?

Take for instance the Department of Housing and Dining's Diversity Action Team. Its sole purpose is to "foster development and enhance growth as it relates to diversity, multi-culturalism, and education." Is that a service that you'd expect from a department whose title suggests that they are only interested in where you sleep and where you eat?

They even go so far as to devote an entire week to diversity programming that is open to the public, much like Community Cultural Harmony Week (formerly Racial and Ethnic Harmony Week).

This year's week begins Sunday and encompasses a mosque tour, an interactive history of stepping (like what the black fraternities and sororities do), an open mic coffee house, and a real-live game of "Street Smarts." The theme is both appropriate and timeless because it motivates further progression by asking us to "Be R.A.D.I.C.A.L. (Recognize and Accept Diversity in College and Life).

Even the Office of Diversity and Dual Career Development works to enhance racial and cultural diversity and create a campus environment that fosters both academic excellence and appreciation of diversity, in addition to providing support to spouses of faculty and staff members who are seeking employment on campus and/or in the Manhattan and surrounding communities.

Imagine, an office designed to foster diversity as well as provide jobs! There go those damn privileges again.

Issues of diversity will remain a never-ending circle of conflict as long as the "haves" disproportionately outnumber the "have-nots." But haven't they heard that the early bird catches the worm? I guess they expect someone to tell them where the worm lives, too? That's what's wrong now – too many people wanting somebody to give them something.

I hope the sarcasm of this column will be obvious to readers. Unfortunately, there will also be people who don't find it sarcastic at all.

Those people are privileged enough to not be directly affected by the types of things I write about. Who would have guessed that in the midst of societal disparity, one of K-State's departments would have the best idea yet? We should all strive to be R.A.D.I.C.A.L.

Tennis ready to begin

3 Cats ranked among top 30 college players

By Wes Marfield
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State's tennis team opens its season today, playing host to No. 41 Brigham Young at 1 p.m. at Ahearn Field House.

The No. 61 Cats will look to improve on last year's 12-9 record, despite the loss of last year's Big 12 Player of the year, Alena Jecminkova.

Returning for the Wildcats are five letter winners, as well as three players in the top 30 of the Intercollegiate Tennis Association's Fall Regional rankings. Senior Petra Sedlmajerova, enters the season ranked 14th in the Central Division, followed by sophomore Maria Rosenberg at 15th and junior Hayley McIver, ranked 28th.

Because there isn't one individual who stands above the rest, Coach Steve Bietau is looking for an even distribution.

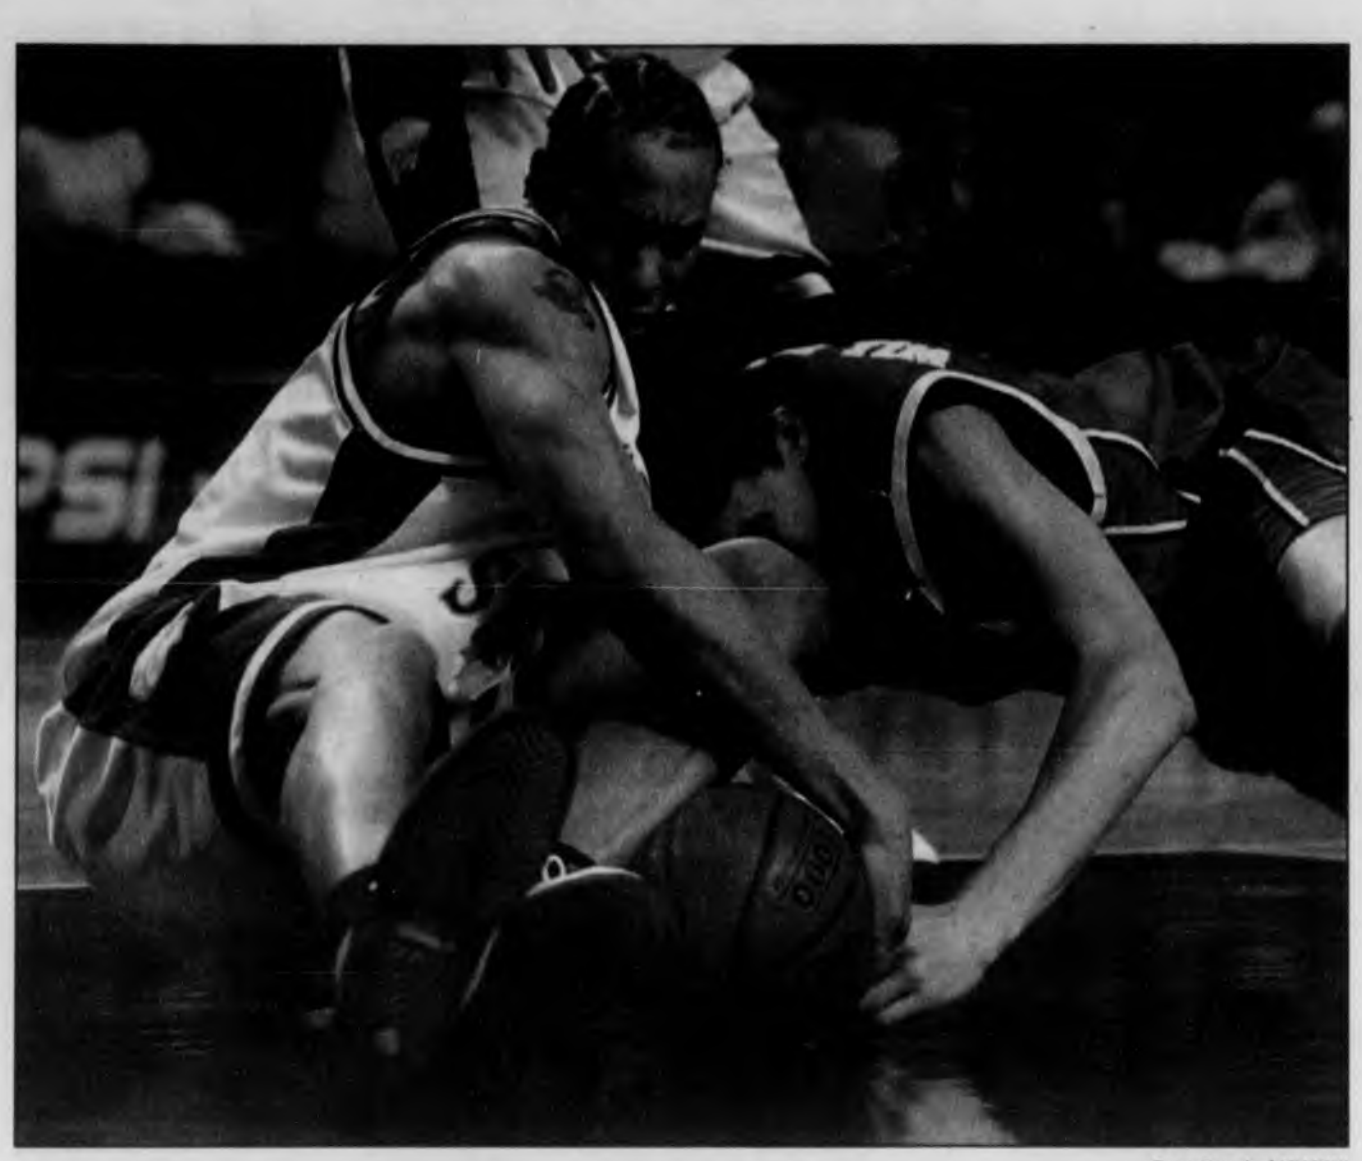
"We're going to have to have a balanced approach to things with contributions from everyone," Bietau said.

BYU will be led by a pair of seniors ranked in the Central Region. No. 7 Dominique Reynolds leads the Cougars, while Lu Oswald, who lost to Rosenberg, 6-2, 7-6, during the second round of the ITA Regional Championships on Oct. 25, is ranked 17th.

"This is a match against a quality opponent and one where we expect to be tested in many ways," Bietau said.

While a long break can many times be a disadvantage, the Wildcats used the recent month-long vacation from school to try and gain the upper hand.

"We had five players here over Christmas break which gave us a good head start over where we would normally be at this time," Bietau said.



The Cats' schedule features 11 teams ranked in the top 75 of the ITA rankings last year, including a home matchup against Big 12 foe Texas, a team that made the NCAA Sweet Sixteen last season. Other NCAA Tournament participants on the slate for K-State include Mississippi, Southwest Missouri State, Texas A&M and Texas Christian.

Despite the tough schedule and the stiff competition in the Big 12, Bietau believes his team can put together a solid season.

"We have the potential for a really strong team and a good season," Bietau said. "We have a competitive program and we're constantly looking to improve."

Cats look to end conference road frustrations at Texas A&M

By Tom Fontana
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State (11-6, 2-2) at Texas A&M (9-5, 1-2)
When: 3 p.m., Saturday
Where: Reed Arena (12,500) — College Station, Texas
Key stat: K-State holds series lead, 9-2

If anything has been the nemesis of K-State men's basketball besides KU the past few seasons, it has been finding a way to win a conference game on the road.

K-State (11-6, 2-2) collected its last road win in league play on Mar. 3, 2001, at Colorado and has since dropped 10 straight.

The Cats take that streak to College Station, Texas, on Saturday for a 3 p.m. tip-off against the Texas A&M Aggies (9-5, 1-2).

Freshman Marques Hayden said the Wildcats' bad habits on the road during the conference slate are something the team must focus on eliminating in order to leave Reed Arena with a win.

"It's always going to be over our shoulders, not winning a Big 12 Conference game on the road," he said.

Hayden's statements came following a 77-53 victory over the Nebraska Cornhuskers on Wednesday night, and after Coach Jim Wooldridge warned the team to not celebrate too much.

"Coach really talked about that," Hayden said. "When you have a win like this tonight, you want to enjoy it, but you've got to turn around and go to Texas A&M.

"That's going to be a tough place to play," he said. "The focus is turned on right now for me. We really need to get this win."

Coming off his fifth double-double in six games, Pervis Pasco, who collected 13 rebounds to go along with 15 points Wednesday, said the Nebraska victory gives the Cats more confidence heading

Without Slocum, Aggies can't stop K-State

The Cats have a golden opportunity to end an embarrassing tendency on Saturday.

K-State has lost 10 straight conference road games and has been successful only four times in the last 4-1/2 years.

Fortunately, Texas A&M is terrible.

JOEL REICHENBERGER

The Wildcats have routinely destroyed them, and unless Janerio Spurlock rejoins the team, they should do so again.

In fact, Jim Wooldridge should thank the Aggies. If they weren't so consistently abysmal, he would be without 20 percent of his Big 12 wins.

One of his two road wins came against A&M, and last year, the dysfunction junction boys must have gotten lost in the Texas desert. The Cats destroyed them 69-38.

Thirty-eight?

How on earth does a Division-1 basketball team score only 38 points?

If they shot half-court shots every time, they could at least reach 39. The residence halls' intensive study floor intramural team might even be able to hang 38 on someone.

Yes, without A&M, that figure of four wins in the last 4 1/2 years would be significantly more embarrassing.

If there's anyone to use as a crutch, it's the Aggies.

Not to mention the Cats have been playing some pretty fine ball recently.

The thing I love about this team is the way there aren't any superstars.

Anyone can come up big when they

Weekend triangular pits Big 12 regional rivals against each other for pride

By Joel Reichenberger
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

In college track, there are meets that are nice to win and some you need to.

For the K-State track team the K-State, KU and MU Triangular at KU this weekend is a meet it needs to win, Coach Cliff Rovelto said.

"We will win that meet. It's not an option not to," he said. "If we don't, it's because we either performed poorly or someone had a heck of a meet that day. The truth of the matter is we are the better team. If we enter the meet intelligently and perform, we should win."

Rovelto said it is important to triumph over conference rivals like KU and Missouri.

It certainly has been his goal in the past. During the last 15 years, the Cats have lost the competition twice, in 1994 to KU and in '98 to Missouri.

The trophy awarded to the winner ("The Jug") has moved very little.

"We have been (winning) for 15 years now and only lost twice the entire time and we were not at all pleased the times we lost it," Rovelto said. "It's a natural rivalry type thing. KU, K-State and Missouri is a bitter rivalry. It's something that has been followed closely by the fans."

Besting rivals and pleasing fans isn't the only thing that will drive Rovelto to win the meet though. He said the triangular is important for another reason.

Rovelto designed the meet with the history of collegiate track in mind. Rovelto said today coaches don't score meets much anymore.

He said doing so is irresponsible. It is born of coaches paying closer attention to the NCAA National Championships.

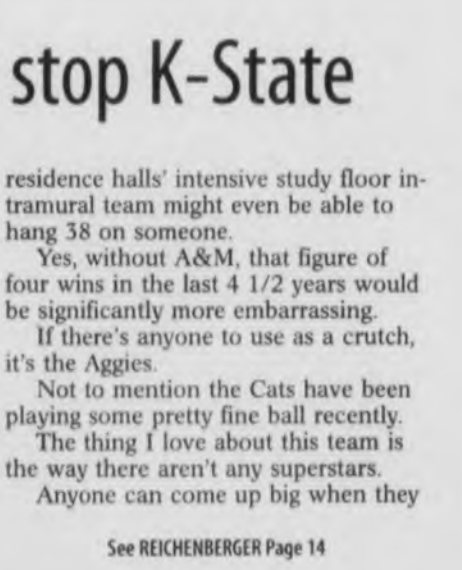
With the coaches worrying primarily about how only their best athletes will do, Rovelto said the importance of small duals and triangulars often falls through the cracks.

In the 1970s, such meets were met with great interest and rivalry, he said. Today, coaches often don't score them.

"I think our sport over the last 20 years has moved away from keeping score. This has happened because people don't want to be held accountable for what they don't do," Rovelto said.

"It has hurt the sport. This meet has kind of grown out of a desire to bring some of that back. Both of the other schools have a history of being very good conference level teams and very good duel meet teams. It's kind of out of a desire to hold on to what is pure and what is best about this sport."

For many Wildcats, the triangular will be the first chance this season to compete in their strongest events.



Senior Amy Mortimer sat out two weeks ago for the Wildcat Invitational and ran only the 800 meter last week at the KSU Invitational. This week Rovelto said she is geared up for the 3,000 meter and the mile runs.

"I'm sure she'll be very competitive against whoever she runs against," Rovelto said. "There's no question she'll go out and run fast.

Junior Rebekah Green will be attempting to better her school shot put record and will also throw the weight.

But Rovelto said the team won't necessarily be gunning for records this weekend.

"This meet is more about competition than it is marks – more about beating the opponent than it is running fast or jumping far. Those things come as a result of the level of competition.

SUPER BOWL XXXVII

The Associated Press

OAKLAND (13-5) vs. TAMPA BAY (14-4)

When: 5:25 p.m., Sunday
Where: Qualcomm Stadium, San Diego
TV: ABC
Opening line: Raiders by 3 1/2.
Record vs. spread: Raiders 12-6, Buccaneers 12-6.
Series record: Raiders lead 4-1.
Last meeting: Raiders beat Buccaneers 45-0 on Dec. 19, 1999, at Oakland.
Last week: Raiders beat Titans 41-24 for AFC title; Buccaneers beat Eagles 27-10 for NFC title.
Raiders offense (league rank): Rush (18), Pass (1), Overall (1)
Raiders defense (league rank): Rush (3), Pass (23), Overall (11)
Buccaneers offense (league rank): Rush (27), Pass (15), Overall (24)
Buccaneers defense (league rank): Rush (5t), Pass (1), Overall (1)

Key matchup:
Bucs coach Jon Gruden vs. Raiders coach Bill Callahan. The Bucs obtained Gruden from the Raiders for a hefty sum of four draft picks and $8 million last offseason. Callahan, who served as Gruden's assistant for seven years with the Eagles and Raiders, was promoted from offensive coordinator to head coach. The two are stark opposites on the sidelines. Gruden is theatrically intense, Callahan is studious and relaxed. Callahan is the mastermind behind the NFL's most potent offense. Gruden's Bucs are led by a ferocious defense.

Injury report:
The National Football League injury report for Super Bowl XXXVII, as provided by the league:
Oakland Raiders: OUT: TE Marcus Williams (ankle-injured reserve). QUESTIONABLE: LB Eric Barton (leg); C Barret Robbins (foot); CB Charles Woodson (leg). PROBABLE: CB Tory James (leg); S Rod Woodson (wrist).
Tampa Bay Buccaneers: PROBABLE: G Cosey Coleman (knee); DT Chartric Darby (calf); WR Joe Jurevicious (knee); LB Nate Webster (ankle); WR Karl Williams (thigh); DE Ellis Wyms (ankle).

Streaks, stats and notes:
Both teams are 1-1 against common opponents. The Bucs beat the Rams, but lost to the Steelers. The Raiders won in Pittsburgh, but lost at St. Louis.
The Buccaneers are 5-7 in the postseason in franchise history, while the Raiders are 25-17 (including 3-1 in Super Bowls).
Tampa Bay led the NFL in total defense and allowed a league-low 196 points, fifth fewest since the 16-game schedule was instituted in 1978.
The Raiders led the league in total offense (389.8 yards per game), yards passing (279.7) and scored 450 points, second most in the NFL.
The Raiders offense allowed 36 sacks during the regular season, while the Bucs allowed 41. The Bucs and Raiders both recorded 43 sacks in regular season, tied for sixth best.
The Bucs led the league with 31 INTs and tied for first in turnover differential at plus-17. The Raiders were one of five teams with fewer than 20 giveaways (19), and had a plus-12 differential.
Raiders WR Jerry Rice led the NFL's No. 1 offense in receptions (92) and yards receiving (1,211), along with seven TDs. Rice owns a Super Bowl record with seven career TDs.
Bucs QB Brad Johnson, 54-31 as starter, set franchise single-season records with 22 TD passes and a 62.3 completion percentage (281-of-451). His 1.3 INT percentage (451 attempts, six INTs) is a club record and best in NFL.
The Raiders defense is ranked No. 3 in the NFL vs. the rush (90.8 yards per game).
Bucs LB Derrick Brooks had four TDs on turnovers in 2002, the most in NFL history by a linebacker.
Bucs CB Brian Kelly tied for the NFL lead with a career-high eight INTs.
Bucs K Martin Gramatica set career highs with 32 FGs and 128 points. Raiders K Sebastian Janikowski also scored 128 points and led all kickers with 22 touchbacks on kickoffs during the regular season.
The Raiders called exactly one running play in the first three quarters of the AFC championship game.
The Bucs started playing in 1976 and went 0-14. In that same season, the Raiders won their first Super Bowl.

WOMEN'S BASKETBALL

Post position

Wecker's award-snub payback could mean long day for UT

BEN FEHR

Last year, K-State women's basketball set aside a day to recognize freshman talent Kendra Wecker.

The day was aptly named "Kendra Wecker Day."

It marked the first time Bramlage Coliseum was sold out for a women's basketball game. The 13,466 fans made up the largest crowd a K-State team had ever played in front of. And the fans didn't go home unhappy.

Wecker responded, scoring 21 points, pulling down 12 rebounds and dishing out three assists as the Wildcats claimed an 85-71 win over the visiting Nebraska Cornhuskers.

The date was Jan. 12, 2002.

On Saturday against Texas, the fans who will pack Bramlage will be a part of "Kendra Wecker Day," part deux.

Who knows how Wecker will respond?

One thing is for certain, though: Wecker has grown leaps and bounds since last January. Last season, Wecker finished averaging 16.4 points and 7.8 rebounds per game.

This season, the sophomore, now K-State's do-everything, go-to player, is averaging 20.4 points and 8.4 rebounds. All told, Wecker ranks in the top 10 in the Big 12 in seven of 12 statistical categories.

Look for her to pour it on against Texas. There are a pair of reasons why.

First, there's the incentive of evening the series at six games apiece in the Texas-K-State all-time history. That record was brought within reach of .500 last year when K-State topped the Horns in double overtime on Jan. 30 in Austin.

Second, Texas sophomore Heather Schreiber will be in town. I'm sure Wecker and Schreiber will be very cordial, as they try to dominate each other as the game wears on.

But I doubt that Wecker has forgotten about last year's Big 12 Freshman of the Year award going to Schreiber.

Schreiber led Wecker in exactly zero statistical categories in the Big 12 last year but still managed to take home the post-season hardware.

I believe the experts said the reason had something to do with Wecker and I'll-shoot-the-pill-from-anywhere-and-you'll-like-it Laurie Koehn splitting the votes in the north.

Sure, sure. Don't get me wrong, Schreiber is a fantastic player. But Wecker is better. In their first meeting, Wecker had 19 points and 10 rebounds to Schreiber's 10 points and nine rebounds.

The second meeting, the Big 12 Tournament showdown that saw the Wildcats top Texas for the second time that season, was all Wecker's.

As the Wildcats dismantled Texas, 79-63, Wecker turned in 22 points and 13 rebounds. Schreiber managed just three points and seven rebounds.

But, hard feelings or none, Schreiber was named the conference's best freshman, and all the voters had to go home and think about what they'd done.

Texas comes in after knocking off Texas Tech, and look out ladies and gentlemen, this is going to be a scrap.

Schreiber will have to explain, in on-court terms, why she is the better player than Wecker this Saturday. But she won't be alone. Add in All-America lock Stacy Stephens, and Texas is a force.

It may be Texas who is higher after beating Tech, but this is K-State's town.

And it's going to be Kendra Wecker's day.

Cats, Longhorns chock-full of hardcourt talent

By Ben Fehr
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

When the Texas Longhorns step on the floor against K-State on Saturday, there are going to be key matchups to look for.

Down low, Longhorns' All-America candidate Stacy Stephens is strong and athletic, scores well at 13.5 points per game and rebounds well at 8.3 rebounds per contest.

The Wildcats will counter Stephens with Nicole Ohlde, another All-America candidate center averaging 18.2 points and 8.5 rebounds per contest.

Sophomore Kendra Wecker, also an All-America candidate, said the Wildcats are confident with Ohlde in the post.

"I think we match up pretty well there," Wecker said. "Ohlde doesn't look like Stacy Stephens, but she can bring a power game when she has to. And she's done a nice job with that, the last few games, especially.

"She's been shooting a very high percentage lately. She's been showing some of those power drop steps. She's been

1ST PLACE | Wildcats looking to set records, maintain top spot

But the Longhorns have been doing some rolling of their own.

On Wednesday, for example, the Longhorns rolled past No. 7 Texas Tech in Austin to knock the Red Raiders from the ranks of the Big 12 unbeaten.

Texas' win over Tech, Coach Jody Conradt's 800th, sets up an intense matchup in Manhattan on Saturday.

The stakes: sole possession of 1st place in the league and a leg up on the second half of the conference slate.

Sophomore forward Kendra Wecker, who will be honored in K-State's second annual "Kendra Wecker Day" when Texas comes to town, said it's important that K-State play its brand of basketball against the Longhorns.

"We want to play our game," Wecker said. "We don't want to get caught up in anything they might try to throw at us and get rattled or frustrated. We just have to do like we've been doing the last few games.

"We need to put points on the board and we need to play good defense."

Part of playing defense is good rebounding, and K-State has been top-notch on the glass this year, pulling down 40.2 boards per contest. But Texas has been better. The Longhorns are averaging 42.5 boards per game.

Wecker said K-State must control Texas on the glass if the Wildcats are to send the Longhorns home with a loss.

"That's something we have to bring against Texas," she said. "They're in the top one or two in the Big 12 in offensive and defensive rebounding. We have to bring that to the floor because, if not, they're going to get a lot of second-chance baskets.

"That's what hurts, especially when you're playing good defense and they get the easy put-backs."

Junior All-America candidate Nicole Ohlde will likely play a big role in the rebounding battle Saturday afternoon and should also be a pivotal part of K-State's scoring attack.

Ohlde comes in averaging 18.2 points per game to go along with 8.5 rebounds, numbers she will have to produce to top Texas' own All America candidate Stacy Stephens.

Stephens is averaging fewer points than Ohlde at 13.6 per game, but more rebounds, at 9.8 per outing.

Ohlde said the match up with Stephens is one she's looking forward to.

"Any game you play is fun," Ohlde said. "Texas coming in here will be fun just because of the talent they bring to the floor. About the match up with Stacy, hopefully our team defense can come together and stop all of the Texas players.

"But the ability that Stacy brings to the floor makes her a great player. It's going to be fun to battle against her on both ends."

After earning the big win over Texas Tech on Wednesday, the Longhorns will come to Manhattan as a team in control of their own destiny in the Big 12.

But the Wildcats control their own fate as well.

Coach Deb Patterson said she is aware of what Texas will bring to Manhattan this weekend.

"I expect they'll be 150 percent ready to go," Patterson said. "This is a team who's focus is on winning the Big 12 Championship. They're a top-10 program in my mind, and they are as talented a basketball team as any in the country.

"They are on a mission. They are on the same mission we are, and that's to win the Big 12."

MATCHUPS | Ohlde, Wecker to meet Longhorn's best this weekend

finishing strong, and she's finishing the three-point plays."

Another matchup with a possibility of a power contest is that of Wecker against 2001-02 Big 12 Freshman of the Year Heather Schreiber. Schreiber is averaging 12.8 points and 7.9 rebounds per contest.

Wecker is scoring 20.4 points and pulling down 8.4 rebounds.

And while Wecker has dominated Schreiber in their previous two meetings, the Texas forward is coming off a win against Texas Tech where she and Stephens combined for 35 points.

Schreiber also pulled down a career-high 15 rebounds to go with her 15 points against the Red Raiders.

But the other three matchups on the floor this Saturday leave questions.

Longhorn guards Jamie Carey, Tai Dillard, and Nina Norman, along with forward Kala Bowers, are just a few of the players Texas will probably confront K-State.

Still, Ohlde said the matchup game is one the Wildcats are certainly capable of handling.

"I think we have a lot of matchups that are the same," Ohlde said.

"If we go out and do the things we're capable of, get into our offense, get to our spots, rebound the ball well and play team defense, we will match up pretty well."

Coach Deb Patterson said that matching up against the talented Longhorns is made more difficult after the loss of a key Wildcat guard.

"We are really kind of retooling and restructuring and taking steps backwards with respect to developing our execution and our defense because of the loss of Laurie Koehn," Patterson said.

"And while we are taking steps backwards by relearning and repositioning people, I think we are continually building individual quality. We have defended well to this point and time in the season."

Texas is 12-4 overall and 5-0 in the Big 12, a mark good enough for a half-game lead on K-State in the Big 12 standings.

The Wildcats will be looking to wrest that first place position away from Texas on Saturday using defense, Patterson said.

"We have had halves where we have held some of our Big 12 opponents to 20 points or below," Patterson said. "Early in the season, I think that's impressive. It's something to build upon.

"I think we can expect to be a quality defensive team against Texas. And we will have to be if we expect to compete for an upper tier finish in this league."

Big 12 standings

Several of this weekend's games could significantly affect the league standings, starting with Saturday's contest between the Longhorns and Wildcats at Bramlage Coliseum.

Texas Tech takes on Colorado on Sunday with sole possession of 3rd place in the Big 12 on the line.

Oklahoma and Baylor also hook up in a battle of the league's No. 5 and No. 6 teams Sunday.

Colbert Hills reduces fees

Crystal Becker
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Colbert Hills Golf Course and the K-State Student Union have teamed up to provide students with an affordable golf game.

Students now can receive discounted green fees at Colbert Hills, free golf club rental on the Teaching Par 3 Course and free entry to an annual golf clinic and student golf tournament.

Bernard Pitts, executive director of the Union, said students now can take advantage of a world-acclaimed golf course sitting in their own backyard.

"With the Union as a member of the Colbert Hills Benefactor Club, a student can now go out there and get between 30 to 40 percent taken off the student rate while getting to play a world-recognized course."

Don Rathbone, executive director for development at Colbert Hills, said the Union and the golf course worked together to bring a student presence to Colbert Hills.

"We want it to be the students' course – that's the key," Rathbone said. "Alumni and friends of the university put money into the course, so we want to make sure the students have the opportunity to take advantage of it as well."

Pitts said the Union Governing Board will contribute $5,000 of the Union operating budget per year to Colbert Hills, reducing student fees for five years.

"This kind of program is potentially no more expensive than the cost of other programs at the Union," he said. "So, from a program perspective, as we fulfill our mission, it's just natural."

Rathbone said Colbert Hills always has wanted to add a student dimension.

"We feel like it's the K-State course," Rathbone said.

David Gourlay, director of golf operations for Colbert Hills, said the golf course and the Union began negotiating in fall 2002, with rates effective immediately.

"We've made rates very attractive for students," he said. "Students new to the game may use the practice facility, with a driving range, putting area, sand traps – it's pretty elaborate."

Pitts said students can take advantage of this opportunity, even if they don't have clubs.

"I'm glad the Union Governing Board understood the significance of offering students something unique," he said.

Gourlay said the nine-hole Teaching Par 3 Course, located next to the 18-hole championship course, is great for students just learning the game.

"Students are able to play around the course in just over an hour," he said. "It's great for your short game. We allow many groups to play together, and sometimes we have group lessons."

Gourlay said that although plans aren't finalized, students can expect a teaching clinic sometime this spring, with the tournament to follow in the spring or fall.

"We'll be giving a clinic to some students who have never played before," he said. "We'll introduce them to the game and make them feel comfortable in coming to Colbert Hills as part of K-State, making it just another home away from home."

Gourlay said that although winter weather conditions may discourage golfing, warm days lie ahead.

"Just 10 days ago, when the temperature was good, we had 165 people out," he said. "During warm weather, you can just go out and hit a few balls. We've been adapting more and more to cater to the needs of the students."

This includes students like Ben Howell.

"Twenty-five dollars is a great price for a really nice golf course like that," Howell, senior in architecture, said. "At other courses around town, you'd spend 10 to 20 dollars on golf, and they aren't near the caliber of golf as Colbert Hills. I would rather pay 25 dollars."

Howell, a golfer for 12 years, said a student tournament would be fun.

"I'm always looking for tournaments like that, but tournaments aren't usually cheap to enter," he said. "I think a lot of people would go for that – I know I would."

Gourlay said the golf course was built to develop golf in the Manhattan area.

"That's what we're here for," Gourlay said, "to make golf enjoyable to students."

Manhattan Souper Bowl drive to collect food items, money

By Crystal Becker
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Super Bowl Sunday is fast approaching, and with it comes an opportunity to help contribute food to needy families throughout the region.

Mindy Lesline, assistant director at the Flint Hills Breadbasket, said volunteers will be collecting soup, other non-perishable food items and money Saturday and Sunday during the annual Manhattan Souper Bowl food drive.

"We collect a lot of food for the holidays, but that gets used quite a bit, so we get wiped out at Christmas," Lesline said. "This is a great way to get replenished."

Lesline said that about 200 volunteers, including students and state legislators, will battle cold weather Saturday and Sunday to help collect an estimated 67,000 pounds of food.

"Collections already began on Monday in some area schools, and there are usually around 80 churches that participate," Lesline said.

Ted Urbanek, sophomore in finance and philanthropy chair at Lambda Chi Alpha fraternity, said the fraternity takes pride in volunteering for the soup drive each year.

Urbanek said Lambda Chi will collect food from 9 a.m. to 3 p.m. Saturday at the east Dillons.

"We have almost 20 people volunteering," he said. "We have started doing this as one of our staple projects. We just try to collect as much as we possibly can."

Souper Bowl

Donations for the Souper Bowl food drive can be made at the following locations this weekend:
Saturday: East Side Dillons from 9 a.m. to 3 p.m. Sunday: Manhattan church services
Throughout the week of Jan. 27-31, donations can be dropped off at the Flint Hills Breadbasket, 905 Yuma St. from 8:30 a.m. to noon and 1 to 4 p.m.

Bill Kennedy, Riley County attorney, first started the soup drive in 1995 after hearing of a similar program in Salina.

"The first year I got my staff and family involved and went out to Waste Management trash service and got great big trash cans to put the food in," Kennedy said. "I called everyone I knew, and we had contests with an object to get food to the churches.

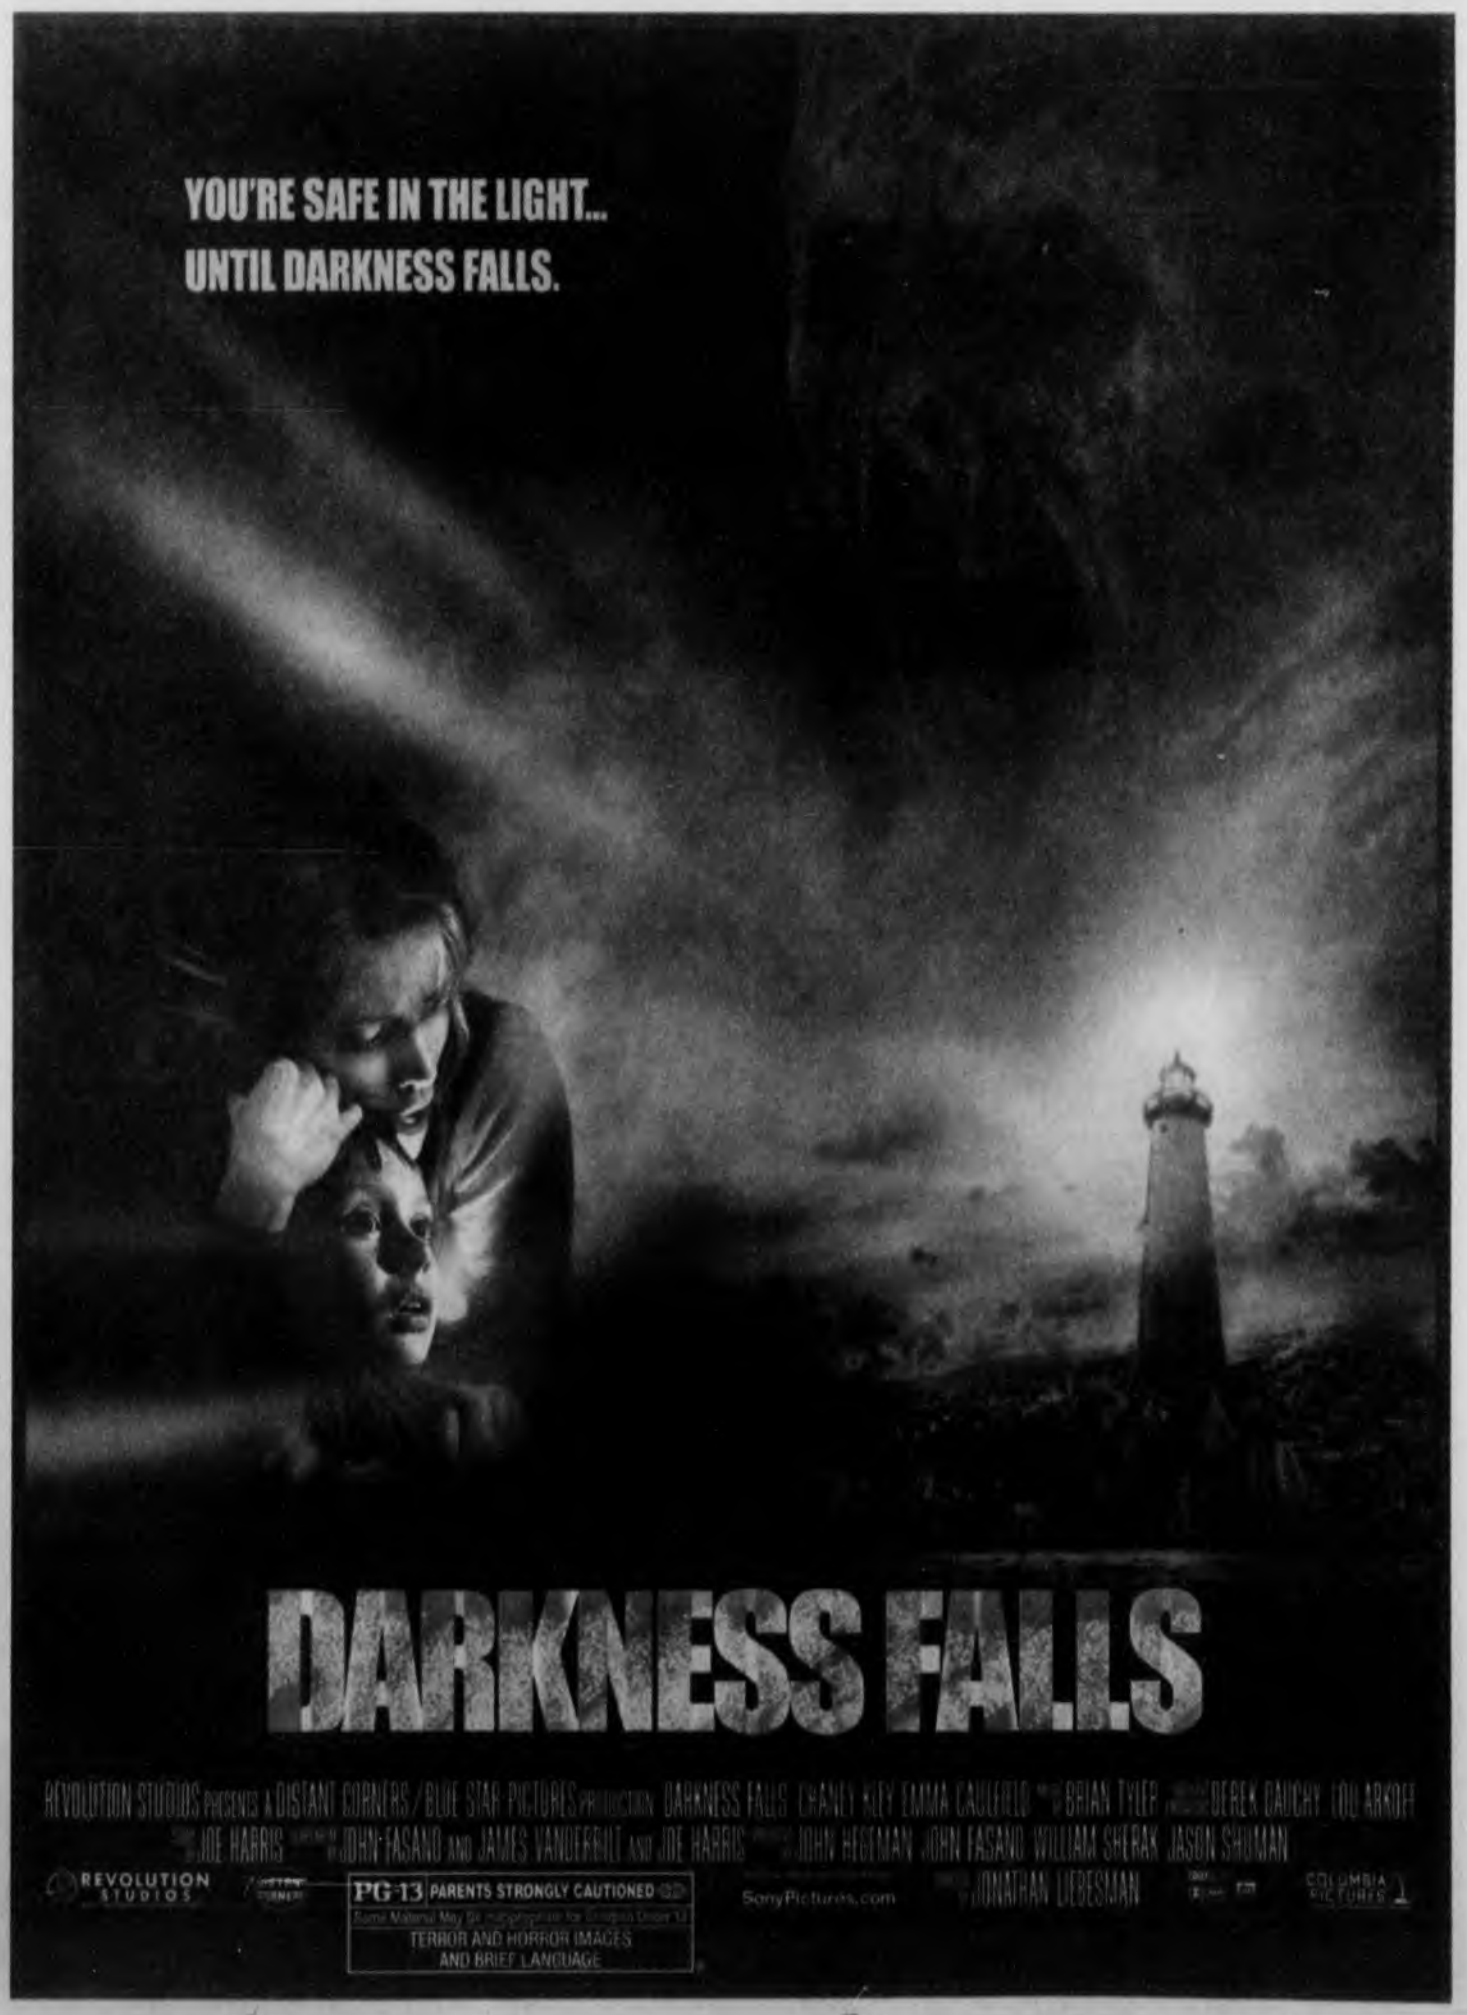
"It all came together, and about a week later, I went down to the Breadbasket and saw this enormous amount of food that I had helped with – it was pretty emotional."

Lesline said that after the food is collected, it is distributed to five local food pantries.

"The people are very grateful," she said. "Just recently a couple families came in and said they wouldn't have any food on their tables without food drives like this."

That's why volunteers won't be scared away by cold weather," Kennedy said.

"It's always cold," he said. "People have said, 'If you guys can stand out in the cold, I can give a can of soup.' In that way, the negative weather has a positive effect. We don't care anyhow, we're going to be there."



Lesline said there are options for those who want to donate food but want to avoid the weekend weather.

"If people can't make it somewhere this weekend, they can always bring in donations to the Breadbasket," she said.

Guy Thing uses tried formula

Movie unoriginal, forgettable at best

"A GUY THING"

Movie review by JJ Duncan

That first impression the previews gave – that this was a trite, forgettable romantic comedy about a guy, a girl and the other girl – was exactly right.

It isn't a very good movie, and Jason Lee gives the most forced performance of his life, but it has some surprisingly redeeming qualities that keep it funny in a kind of long sitcom sort of way. It's the kind of movie that will make you laugh a few times then just forget it was ever made until you have to remember Julia Stiles' movies for some trivia board game.

Paul (Lee, of Kevin Smith movie fame) is engaged to Karen (Selma Blair, "Legally Blonde"), but he gets drunk at his bachelor party and wakes up with Becky the Tiki dancer (Julia Stiles, who is no stranger to bad romantic comedy). The rest of the movie is about Paul playing damage control, trying to get through his wedding and falling for Becky, though he never actually had sex with her in the first place.

The premise of the title is dubiously explained by most of the male characters in the movie. Supposedly, cheating is a guy thing because "we're hunters. It's what we do." And well, Paul thinks he's better than that, and he's out to prove it.

It doesn't sound like a good movie, but it sounds like a rockin' double episode of "Friends."

In fact, the saving grace of the film is its quirky little sitcom-esque jokes that writer Greg Glienna ("Meet the Parents") effortlessly weaves into the story.

One of the funniest sequences in the movie comes when Paul tells his fiancee that the dirty panties hidden in the tank of the toilet were a present he bought from Spin-mart but forgot to give her. When she angrily calls Spin-mart to check out his story, the clerk immediately knows how to cover for the groom-to-be because, hey, it's a guy thing.

Of course, some of the gags involving the parents reek of the trash bin where Glienna threw away his unused "Meet the Parents" jokes, but they still work given the context.

Jason Lee fans will be a bit disappointed, but maybe he thought this was going to be the kind of charmingly satirical comedy that "Kissing a Fool" was.

It's about time to question whether Lee is good in movies that don't involve Kevin Smith because since "Jay and Silent Bob Strike Back," his best work was in the too-long-for-its-own-good "Vanilla Sky." If he keeps making movies like this and "Stealing Harvard," where he basically plays the same character, then the prospects are not so good.

Julia Stiles fans, however, will probably sincerely enjoy the movie, since she makes this kind of junk all the time. At least her performance in this wasn't as dry as usual. Sometimes she actually seems like a real person.

BREACHED SECURITY

'National Security' makes for shallow laughs, interesting stunts

"NATIONAL SECURITY"

Movie review by Wendy Gorman

While good for a few laughs, "National Security" is just the latest action-comedy seeking audience appeal with a wildly mismatched crime-fighting team.

Steve Zahn ("Saving Silverman," "Joyride") and Martin Lawrence ("Life," "Black Knight") star in the show, which is directed by Dennis Dugan. The film drew collective chuckles from the audience on occasion and was not an unpleasant way to pass an hour and a half. Nevertheless, "Security" rarely rose above a run-of-the-mill level.

Zahn plays Hank Rafferty, a Los Angeles police officer with a vendetta against a group of robbers who killed his former partner in a warehouse shootout. His plans are delayed when a zany confrontation between Hank and an L.A. police academy reject, Earl Montgomery (Lawrence), leads to a six-month state penitentiary sentence for Hank.

After his release, the former cop finds himself relegated to working for National Security, a poor shadow of his previous job. Hank follows a lead of a momentarily tripped alarm system he hears on the police scanner to another warehouse and finds the same group of thieves at work. This time, the ensuing shootout draws the attention of Earl, who is also employed by National Security and is stationed at the warehouse.

Earl is drawn into the pursuit of the robbers, and the unlikely and unwilling pair search for the crooks together, bickering constantly in the process.

Plot development more or less takes a backseat to Lawrence and Zahn's shenanigans. The script gives only a very basic idea of who is stealing what and why.

Police corruption is involved somehow, but the writers opted not to waste time making that facet of the plot clear. And though Lawrence and Zahn make a pretty comical couple, they lack the chemistry of great duos. You never quite find yourself rooting for them as you would, say, Jackie Chan and Chris Tucker in "Rush Hour" or Will Smith and Tommy Lee Jones in "Men in Black."

Lawrence is mostly up to his usual tricks, which means being loud and blustery. His character is apparently supposed to be suave with the ladies, but his sexual innuendoes are, for the most part, annoying. Zahn is underused in this movie; more of his sarcastic, often deadpan brand of humor would be welcome amidst Lawrence's wacky voices and wild gesturing. The character of Hank is sadly thin, so Zahn doesn't have much to work with in the first place.

However, the movie does feature some decent, humorous stunts and action sequences.

The best use of this slapstick style occurs when Earl and Hank manage to launch a van out of the back of a wrecked rig, off a bridge and onto a garbage barge. Several car explosions are thrown in for good measure.

The comedy shines the most not in the sight gags, but in a few witty exchanges between Lawrence and Zahn. Naturally, Hank and Earl grow to be great comrades by the time the final credits roll. Audiences probably wouldn't expect anything less. "National Security" is a good fix for Lawrence fans and can entertain reasonably well without much mental exertion on the audience's part.

Phish returns with improved form, maturity in new release

2-year hiatus helps band grow, fills void in hearts of true fans

"ROUND ROOM"

Album review by Tony Herrman

Let's face the facts: any die-hard Phish-head already owns (or refuses to buy it since it's not "Live Phish") the new album, "Round Room."

The album was released Dec. 10, following a two-year hiatus that had resulted in the broken hearts of a lot of young dudes and neo-hippies.

For those casual fans who merely enjoy the band's good vibrations, this album is a keeper. "Round Room" takes the three-star quality of 2000's "Farmhouse" and butters it with more funk.

The opening track, "Pebbles and Marbles," begins with two minutes of the kind of cool jazz you'd expect to hear from a polished quartet in a yuppie restaurant. The song quickly progresses to an archetypical 11-minute Phish jam.

The fourth song, "Mexican Cousin," is an ode to tequila. With the lyrics, "We'll cover every emotion from happiness to sorrow, and the conversations I forget you'll tell me about tomorrow," the song sounds like something Homer Simpson once said about alcohol being the cause and solution to all of life's problems.

For the first time since the album's opening song, Phish really cuts loose on the sixth track, "Seven Below." Like most Phish songs, "Seven Below" – an awesome eight-and-a-half minute jam – is accompanied by nonsensical poetry from lyricist and high school buddy of frontman Trey Anastasio, Tom Marshall. This verse is just repeated several times: "Blue, Sspinter and grow, new crystals of snow, seen several kinds, through seven below."

"Mock Song," the seventh song, is sung by bass player Mike Gordon. While Anastasio handles the usual lead vocals well, Gordon's singing makes for a pleasant change. Gordon sings with the kind of choppy ease that would make for a great "Sesame Street" sing-along, with dancing Muppets in the foreground.

The last five songs of "Round Room" are perhaps its five best and five most original.

The first three seconds of "46 Days," the album's eighth song, have hit written all over them, with what sounds like the beating of a cowbell. "46 Days" is to "Round Room" what "Back on the Train" was to "Farmhouse" – an infectious funk-anthem, with simple and catchy lyrics.

"All of these Dreams," resembles the slow burn of a Grateful Dead song like "(Walk Me Out In The) Morning Dew." The coolest thing about this song is that the music is as beautiful as the place it describes.

The first minute of "Walls of the Cave" begins with a great Page McConnell piano solo, which has shades of Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue." It then flows into four minutes of a melodramatic clash that sounds more like a Vanessa Carlton song. The song is turned on its ear at the five minute mark and produces a great five minute jam.

"Round Room" has more hits than misses for a successful 78 minutes. What started out as another "Farmhouse," turned out to be a product of a lot of growth for Phish.

Even if "Round Room" wasn't such a good album, it wouldn't matter because just having the band back is enough.

Teams discuss positive change

Event participants propose plans of 'United Nations' for increased communication between campus groups

By Allyson Knight
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

While most students used winter break to get away from campus, some set out to improve it.

Fifty-three undergraduate and graduate students participated in Leadership Challenge, Jan. 8-11 at the Rock Springs 4-H Center.

The event took the place of LeaderShape, a nationally organized program students have attended in the past, said Candi Pitts, associate director of leadership studies program.

"The experience (LeaderShape) was great, but we wanted to tailor to K-State flavor," Pitts said.

The new program was coordinated by Leadership Studies and Programs, the Office of Student Activities and Services, the Office of Student Life, Union Program Council and several students.

Students spent four days at the challenge participating in numerous activities, which included mountain climbing, team building exercises and a physical challenge course.

Justin Raybern, freshman in secondary education, said the many activities gave him the opportunity to learn where others are coming from.

On the third day, students formed a collaboration team, a diversity coalition and a communication team.

Within these teams, students created plans of action to make positive changes on campus.

The collaboration team presented a proposal to Carla Jones, director of student life, and Chuck Werring, director of The department of Housing and Dining Services, about setting up a "United Nations" for various organizations on campus to use.

The team would like to develop a Listserv for all campus organizations.

"The program would encourage various organizations across campus to network and help each other out," Marcia Dolchek, junior in elementary education, said.

The team plans to present its proposal to the K-State administration soon.

"Our goal is to have this program grow and help increase involvement and teamwork throughout Kansas State University, including the Salina campus," Dolchek said.

The diversity coalition created three action plans. One plan involves the team working closely with representatives from each college of the President's Commission on Multicultural Affairs in order to better voice student opinions on diversity.

"Our hope for the outcome of the diversity coalition initiatives is to simply effect a change in awareness and exposure of the campus to diversity issues and to create a more positive, inclusive campus climate," said Brandi Edwards, graduate student in adult occupation and continuing education.

The communications team is working on two proposals. First, team members would like to create a forum in which students can express their opinions for a few minutes in front of other students.

"Putting a face behind a voice would be more meaningful," J.C. Stoner, junior in physical sciences, said.

The team also is trying to improve communication between advisers and students.

"Our goal is to make it a better community," Stoner said.

Now that the students have the experience of the challenge behind them, they are ready to make changes, Pitts said.

"This is just the beginning. When the challenge ended, that was the beginning," she said. "Students are back on campus, committed to making positive changes."

Diplomats debate second resolution condemning Iraq; Powell open to idea

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

UNITED NATIONS – Preparing for a crucial report on the work of his inspectors in Iraq, Hans Blix said Thursday his teams are gaining access to sites but Baghdad still isn't fully cooperating with the inspectors.

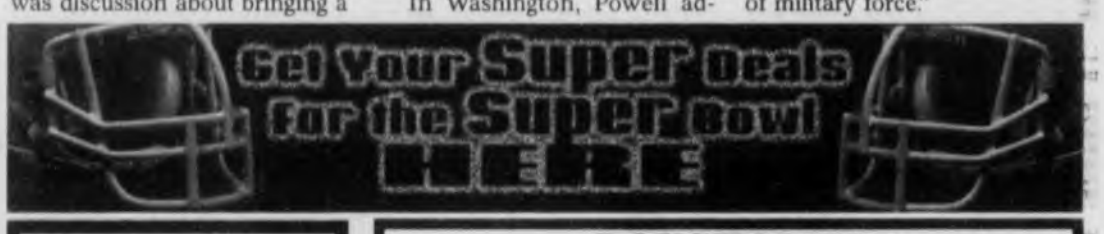
In the meantime, diplomats said there was talk of formulating a second resolution condemning Iraq but stopping short of explicitly authorizing military action.

Secretary of State Colin Powell said the United States was open to the idea of a second resolution but the French ambassador, who is currently the president of the Security Council, said a majority of the council wouldn't support it now.

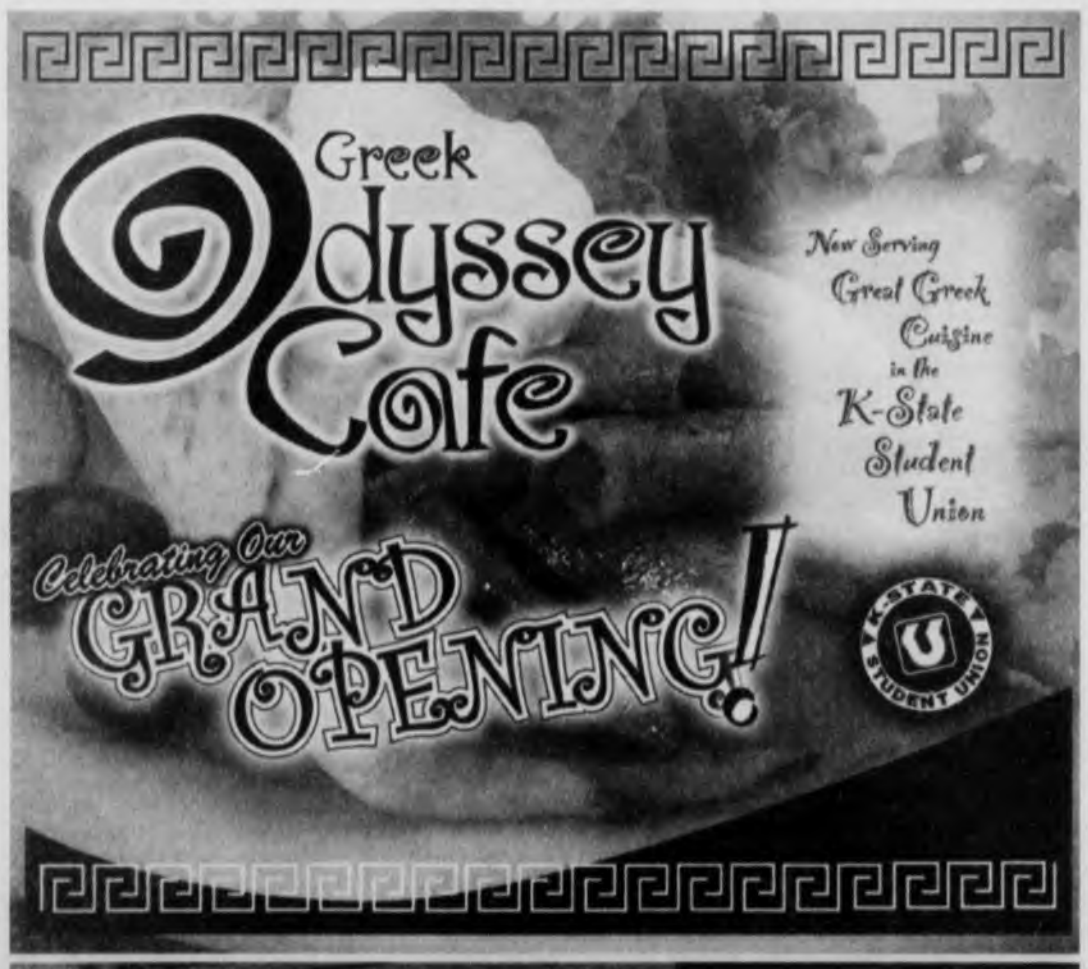
Blix told The Associated Press on Thursday that his assessment of Iraq's compliance during the past two months will be presented Monday to the Security Council as a speech, rather than a formal report, and won't include samples taken during searches for weapons in Iraq.

The report will be crucial for any U.S. decision to press the Security Council for military action against Iraq. Under U.N Security Council Resolution 1441, crafted by Washington, Iraq could be found in "material breach" – diplomatic language which could open the door to war – if it fails to cooperate with inspectors and disarm.

According to the resolution, the council is required to hold consultations over the inspectors' report. But the United States believes it doesn't need Security Council approval to launch an attack if Iraq is failing to disarm.



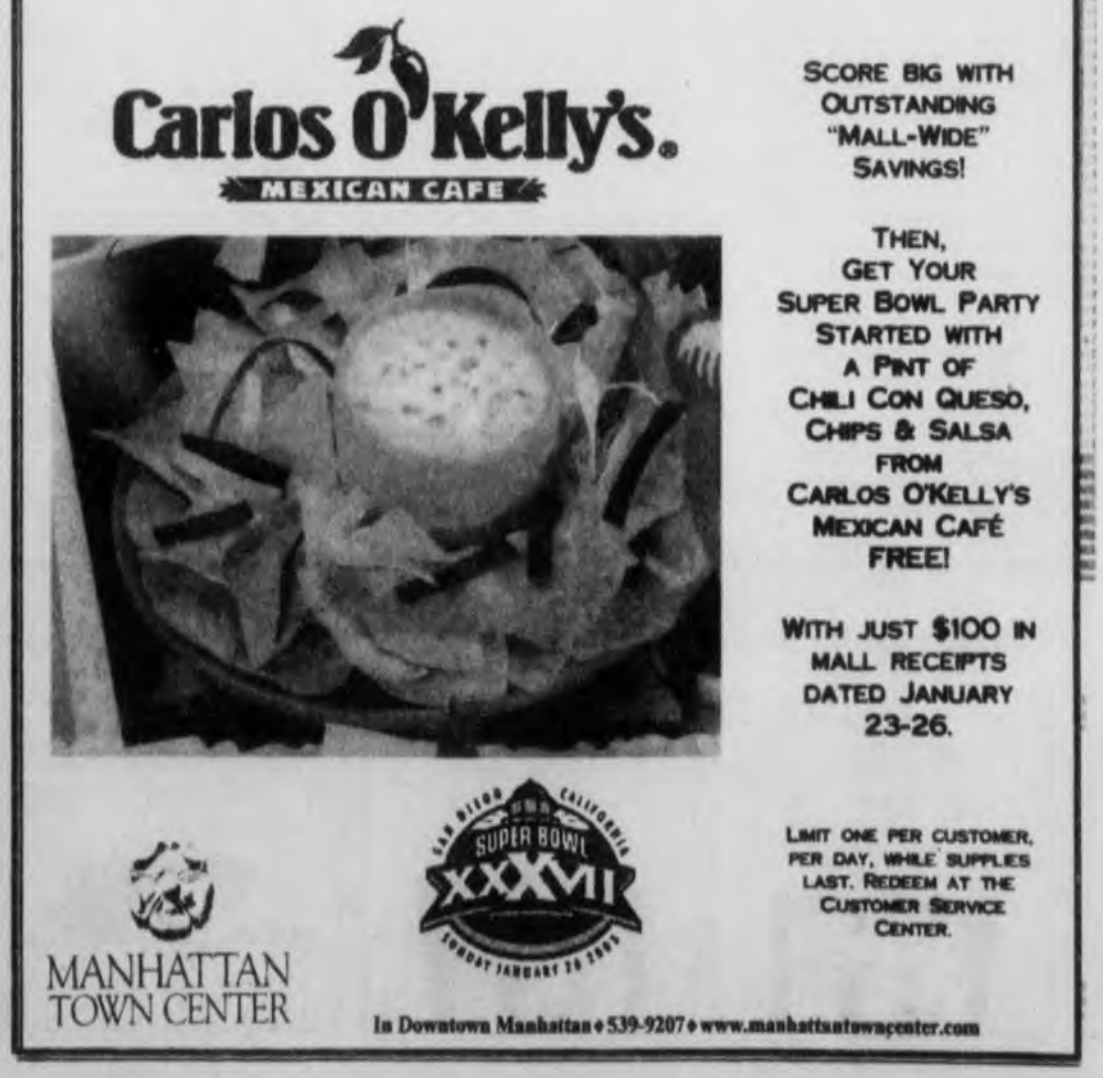
Other countries disagree, including France, Germany, Russia and China, which all believe a second resolution would be needed to authorize force. At this stage, all four countries are against military intervention in Iraq.



Several diplomats said there was discussion about bringing a second resolution to the council which would condemn Iraq for failing to comply with inspectors but stop short of authorizing military action.

Such a resolution could be seen as a compromise between the United States and allies who are unwilling to strike at Iraq at any time.

In Washington, Powell addressed the possibility of a second resolution.



"I think we have always held a position that there is probably sufficient authority in earlier resolutions or in 1441, but we know that many of our colleagues in the Security Council would prefer to see a second resolution if it comes to the use of military force."

RESOLUTION | Officials offer tips for keeping up with resolutions

week, which is unusual. Bullard said she works with people in appointments, preparing an appropriate work-out and diet plan.

Though numbers are high now, Bullard said it never stays that way.

"Generally, at the beginning of the semester, we have more people, then it dwindles down over the course of the semester," she said. "It's important to learn to live a healthy lifestyle now when we are young and in college."

Come Jan. 1, Rod Cruz, sophomore in business, didn't blow a New Year's horn and decide to lift weights or go jogging. His resolution was a common made, and broken, one.

"I decided I needed to start going to class for a change and just get better grades," he said.

Cruz said he tended to skip lecture classes too often. Now he has his schedule written in all his folders and he has resolved not to tell himself that skipping just one class won't hurt anything.

Judy Lynch, director of the Academic Assistance Center, said AAC has already seen an increase in the number of students seeking tutors this semester. Lynch said the free tutoring can be very helpful to students, though many forget the service exists on campus.

Lynch also had some advice about keeping on top of class.

"Go to class regularly and schedule study time like it's class time," she said. "Many of the students who aren't successful in their classes don't schedule enough study time for those classes."

So does the idea of a morning workout, attending classes and a tutor session have you stressed? It's no surprise that reducing stress and relaxing more is another common resolution.

Lia Boediman, psychology intern for Lafene Counseling Services, said counseling services offers tips for reducing stress on its Web site, www.k-state.edu/counseling.

She said New Year's resolutions shouldn't be set too high.

"Set a realistic goal for yourself," she said. "If you want to reduce stress, then devote five minutes a day to relaxation even if it seems like you're too busy. Even just a short walk or relaxation exercises can help. Set specific goals with a plan you can stick to."

to College Station.

"It gives us a lot of confidence after losing two games, coming in and getting a good win against Nebraska," Pasco said. "We'll be trying to get back over the .500 mark in conference."

Wooldridge said this weekend's game presents a chance for K-State to get above .500, as well as a chance for the Cats to help their long-term plans.

"We look at every game like that, believe it or not," he said. "It's the next big opportunity for us. We told our guys all week long that if you want more, if you want to climb in this league, if you want to have opportunities later in the year, you've got to improve, and you've got to win."

The Aggies possess a strong tandem of senior Bernard King, whose 16.9 points per game ranks ninth in the Big 12, and freshman Antoine Wright, who ranks 12th in the conference with 16.4 points a game.

"We all know that Texas A&M is a much-improved basketball team," Wooldridge said. "We think we are too. We are going to go down there with some confidence and try to seize on this opportunity to win."

are asked to. Defending the Cats is like grabbing a giant handful of Jell-O. It just slips out of your hands and you don't know how to stop it.

Well, maybe it isn't exactly like that, but you know what I mean.

One night Gilson DeJesus will turn on the scope and sniper shoot from anywhere on the floor. The next night, Matt Siebrandt can demonstrate how an ugly left-handed hook shot really can earn a free college education.

Sometimes Pervis Pasco will own the glass and throw down a dunk that shakes the bleachers. Even the mild Jarrett Hart stepped up huge against Nebraska.

Fresh off the bench from an injury, Hart looked better than he had all season and reigned destruction with a previously unknown confidence.

But, sometimes the Cats do play streaky, and that could mean disaster in College Station. A win against Colorado would have been great for the team but for our friend Pasco.

He air-balled two free throws in a row. Two in a row! How do you do that? I would be so scared after the first miss that I would baseball pass the ball at the backboard just to make certain I hit something.

Anything.

Just so long as it's not another air ball.

Texas A&M did have a chance, though. And it didn't come from either of their two players scoring more than 16 points per game.

Rather it came from junior center Andy Slocum.

Slocum managed a weak 4.1 points per game, but it was his heritage that scared me.

There's something about Aggies named Slocum that makes them put up amazing, unpredictable performances and beat K-State.

Fortunately, at a university ripe with tradition, they followed through with the one that involves stupid decisions and canned lil' Andy just like they did his Slocum kin, R.C.

One day, Andy came skipping home from practice all excited to sit down and count his season point total on one hand again, when he found a funny little bottle in his closet that he hadn't noticed before.

He never saw the Aggie secret agent jump out the window and he was utterly shocked when his coach informed him possessing bottles of steroids was against A&M policy.

If only Texas A&M had stopped to think that Slocums are the Cats' kryptonite.

IS GOD CALLING YOU AND GETTING A BUSY SIGNAL?

do you feel a longing for more in your life?
do you want joy?
do you long to follow in the footsteps of Jesus?

In today's world, it's so easy to lose sight of why we're really here. So perhaps the thought of devoting your entire life to God has never crossed your mind.

Then again maybe it has. Maybe you're the one of the rare women who are being called by God to follow in the footsteps of Jesus. And if you'd only take a moment to really listen to your inner voice. God will get through.

We are the Sisters of St. Joseph, an international order with roots right here in Wichita. And we invite you to come live a life of holiness, in a community where we strive for unity and reconciliation among all people with God and with one another. Ours is a community of prayer and service. Our dedication to God motivates us and is the source of joy for all that we do.

But how can you know if you truly have been called? Do you feel a longing for more in your life? Do you feel a void in your heart? Do you radiate joy? Does love pour out of your smile and do you long to follow Jesus?

If so, you owe it to yourself to answer God's call. To learn more about The Sisters of St. Joseph, call or visit us online. You'll be eternally grateful you did.

Police serve 64 warrants

By James Hurla
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Sixty-four warrants were cleared Thursday during the Riley County Police Department's Warrant Day, and a few more were trickling in Friday, Lt. Kurt Moldrup said.

The project was RCPD's attempt to serve about 100 outstanding warrants, as it devoted three extra officers, all detectives and the civil processing unit to the cause, Moldrup said.

Twenty-six of the warrants were cleared by recall, Moldrup said, which means the people took it upon themselves to pay their fines or make arrangements with the court. Another 34 were cleared by arrest, while four were cleared because the warrants were returned to a different jurisdiction.

Capt. Gary Grubbs told the Collegian on Wednesday that 50 to 75 arrests would declare the day a success.

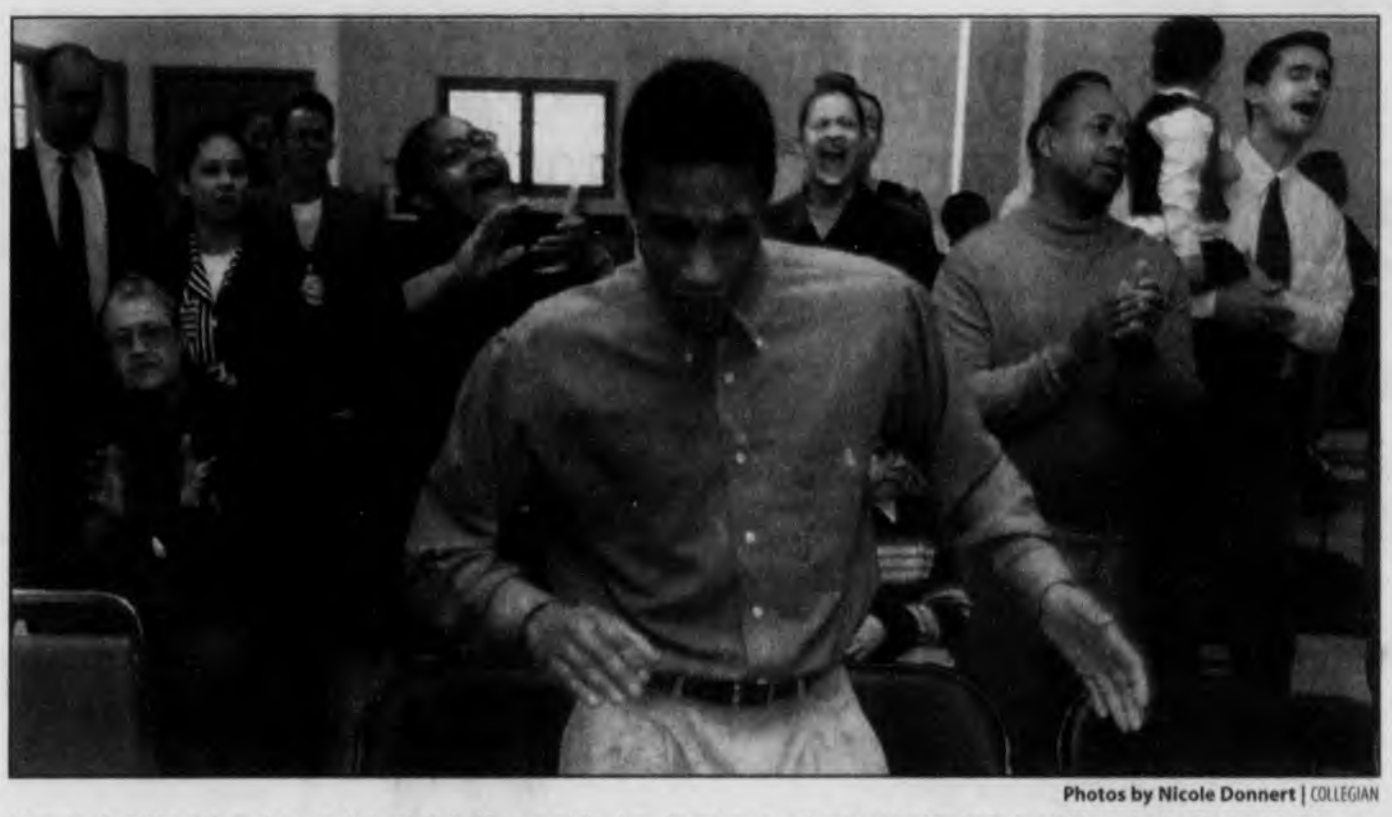
About 2,000 outstanding warrants were prioritized by bond amounts, severity of the crime and the probability that the individuals were still in the area. The RCPD focused on about 100 warrants for which it could actively search Thursday.

Based on the success of the project, Moldrup said, it most likely will continue as an annual event.

But Moldrup said he expects more of the warrants to be cleared as a result of this year's project, as more people turn themselves in or are reported by neighbors.

"A lot of people may go to court and take care of it themselves," he said.

While Thursday was declared Warrant Day, Moldrup said, there are officers and detectives out every day trying to serve warrants.



"It's an ongoing process," he said. "We're not going to stop looking."

"I saw a huge thing of smoke in the air. I thought it must be steam coming off the river. I thought, 'It can't be the church.' But it was."

$450,000 damage final toll for wiring fire

By Sarah Rice
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Robert Berry put on his glasses and squinted at a miniature Bible.

"I lost all my Bibles in the fire except this one," he said.

The early-morning fire Friday at the United Pentecostal Church destroyed the other Bibles, as well as the building at 700 Vattier Street, leaving this minister only one to read from.

Berry led his congregation in worship Sunday at the Colonial Gardens clubhouse.

"Tragedies do occur, but far greater tragedies could have occurred," Berry told the church members. "The church is not the building that is there, but the church is the people that are here."

Berry was awakened at 3 a.m. to the news that the church was on fire. As he drove through town, he said he saw the smoke.

"I saw a huge thing of smoke in the air. I thought it must be steam coming off the river," Berry said. "I thought, 'It can't be the church.' But it was."

The fire was determined to be caused by bad wiring underneath the altar area, the Manhattan Fire Department reported in a press release. Damage estimates reported this weekend were $300,000 for structural damage and $150,000 for contents.

Ice covers the remains of the inside of the Pentecostal Church at 700 Vattier on Friday afternoon. The church was destroyed by a fire around 3 a.m. Friday morning. Assistant Chief Don Francis of the Manhattan Fire Department said it was an accidental fire that started in the west end of the church.

Jeanel Drake | COLLEGIAN

Insurance is expected to cover the damages. Berry said the church switched insurance companies a year and a half ago and the new agent declared them grossly underinsured, so the policy was updated, something Berry is now grateful for.

"The Bible says all things happen for good for those who love the Lord," Berry said. "I don't want you to be discouraged. Everything happens for a purpose and reason."

Church members spent the weekend sorting through ashes and rubble, salvaging very few items. They did recover backup disks with a record of all tithes given over the years, and now the church looks to Fox Business Systems to restore the information despite the fire damage.

Berry said what was going through his mind as he surveyed the damage was the $25,000 worth of renovations recently completed, including a new basketball court and tiling.

Lafene set to move off campus

By Kelli Pitman
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Lafene Health Center will soon have a new home – off campus.

The student health center is in the process of working out the details of a move to the second floor of Mercy Regional Health Center on Sunset Avenue.

Lanny Zweimiller, Lafene director, said the plan is to move in June or July 2003. This plan has been in the works for about six years and is still in the process of negotiations, so the schedule remains tentative.

Robert Krause, vice president of institutional advancement, said the university is ready to go, but is waiting on Riley County officials and Mercy executives to reach an agreement on the building lease.

When space opened up at the health center, the university acted on the opportunity to open the current Lafene building for additional classroom and office space, Zweimiller said. The building is an ideal place to hold classes, he said, because it is centrally located and in good condition.

Some offices currently located in Denison Hall, will be moved to the Lafene building.

Activists protest action on Iraq

By Kari Kennedy
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

They're not going to stop until something is done.

"We will do it from now on until we know there is going to be no war. As long as the threat of war is there we will be doing it," said Talat Rahman, organizer for the Coalition for Peace in the Middle East.

About 70 people gathered at noon Saturday on the corner of Tuttle Creek Boulevard and Bluemont Avenue with signs in hand, conveying their thoughts on the war.

Slogans such as "give peace a chance" and "don't bushwack Iraq" were displayed as oncoming traffic looked on.

This demonstration, organized by the Coalition for Peace in the Middle East and the Manhattan Alliance for Peace and Justice, had one message in mind: they don't want to go to war.

"People will see us willing to stand in the cold and that we are not going to stand quietly," Sarieah MacDonald, local activist, said.

MacDonald was one of the organizers who helped send students to the national peace rally in Washington on Jan. 18. William Wake, sophomore in political science, took part in that rally.

"I had never been to any large protests, just smaller ones. I wanted to see 500,000 people march for peace," he said. "Plus, it's nice to march in D.C. It's like following history."

Stone Lamb, graduate student in English cultural studies, said he thinks it is important to be heard.

K-State Physics Professor Talat Rahman, right, holds a sign with Manal Kara, freshman in open option, as Manhattan residents Jamie Cobb and Peter Oviatt play percussion during a protest against action on Iraq Saturday on Tuttle Creek Boulevard.

Zach Long | COLLEGIAN

"There is a kind of stigma attached to protests that keeps people away," he said. "It is important to overcome the discomfort and let people know it's OK to express disapproval with the current situation."

Another activist, Rhonda Janke, agreed.

"There's a lot of people who are deep down questioning the war," she said. "It is important if we disagree that we should speak out. It is OK to be vocal."

She said she hopes these ongoing demonstrations will encourage people to think about the situation.

"I hope students are reading and thinking about all

Spacey ventures into singing, performs duet with rock icon

Kevin Spacey will show off his vocal talents alongside Elton John at a fund-raiser next month for a historic London theater.

The pair will perform a duet of some of John's hit songs at a Feb. 5 benefit for the Old Vic, organizers said Thursday. John is chairman of the Old Vic Theater Trust, which bought the 185-year-old theater in 1998 when it was in danger of closing.

Built in 1818, the Old Vic was for generations the proving ground of British actors, and is the former home of Laurence Olivier's National Theater company.

Spacey, who starred in Eugene O'Neill's "The Iceman Cometh" at the Old Vic in 1998, is a board member of the trust. In November 2001, he performed The Beatles' "Hey Jude" at the Old Vic during a tribute to Sept. 11 victims.

The benefit also will feature Sinead O'Connor, Ms. Dynamite, Sharleen Spiteri from the Scottish band Texas, Lulu, Diana Krall and Elvis Costello. They will perform hits by John.

Somers gets walk of fame star

Suzanne Somers, who played ditsy blonde Chrissy Snow on the 1970s sitcom "Three's Company," now has a star on the Hollywood Walk of Fame.

"And the nuns in Catholic school said I'd never get to heaven," Somers joked at the ceremony Friday. "This is heaven and I'm just floating in it."

Somers, 56, also is author of 10 books on weight loss and owns the ThighMaster line of fitness products.

Somers' star is near the Hollywood Roosevelt Hotel, site of the first Academy Awards ceremony.

On hand to see Somers honored were singer Barry Manilow, entertainer Merv Griffin and CBS Television President Leslie Moonves.

Lavigne wins Asia awards

Singer Avril Lavigne won favorite female artist, favorite breakthrough artist and the style award at the second annual MTV Asia Awards.

Linkin Park won the favorite rock act and favorite video awards. The awards were presented Friday night before an audience of 8,000 at Singapore's Indoor Stadium.

Performers included Lavigne, Missy Elliot, Robbie Williams, the British band Blue and Singapore's hometown diva, Stefanie Sun.

Nineteen awards were presented to artists and personalities selected by viewers from 10 countries in the region. The three-hour show was co-hosted by Jamaican rapper Shaggy and Hong Kong pop star Coco Lee.

Bush honors teachers

Jack Guy wanted somebody famous to hand out the first checks from a program he set up to honor outstanding teachers here in his hometown. So he phoned an old World War II buddy, George Bush.

The former president said he'd gladly oblige and even brought along former first lady Barbara Bush for Friday's ceremony.

Before 600 people crowded into the elementary school gym, Guy and the Bushes presented $2,500 checks to teachers Teresa Eason and Erin Stone.

"When I think of all the good you all are doing, I have no doubt you are doing God's work right here on earth," Bush told the audience of mostly teachers. "And that makes all of you winners."

Guy, a former stock broker and financial consultant, established the awards program with $40,000 after hearing a speech by first lady Laura Bush.

KSU Foundation's annual Telefund seeks $1.4 million in donations

By Wendy Lynn
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A 2002 Nissan Frontier, a $1,000 scholarship and a picnic lunch for 30 are just a few things students will walk away with at Telefund 2003.

Telefund is an all-volunteer campus phone-a-thon that enlists 1,700 students to call K-State alumni from across the nation. The 24th annual Telefund kicked off this last week at K-State-Salina and Sunday night in Manhattan.

"I love Telefund. It's the coolest fund-raiser I have ever been involved with," said Jonathan Mitchell, senior in public relations who was helping with Telefund on Sunday.

K-State ranks first in the Big 12 and fourth nationally for its Telefund campaign. Coordinated by the KSU Foundation, Telefund has raised more than $15.6 million since 1980.

"Tradition, loyalty, pride and an all-for-one attitude are what make Telefund so successful," Gordon Dowell, director of annual giving, said.

Student callers have the opportunity to win scholarships and prizes by calling for Telefund. This year's scholarship and prize pool is valued at $90,000. To be eligible for prizes, students must attend one night at Telefund from 6 to 10 p.m.

Many local businesses donate prizes to support Telefund. About two-thirds of the prizes are selected through random drawings. The top three callers from each college also will be recognized with prizes.

Other ways to receive prizes are for pledges received, milestone pledges and large pledges.

Students are encouraged to make their first calls to parents or family members. Any donations from these calls go into a separate scholarship fund designated for Telefund callers.

Emily Happer | COLLEGIAN

Gordon Dowell, director of annual giving, places a cooler on Jake Mooney, senior in finance and pre-law, as Erin Dittman, junior in agricultural economics and pre-law, looks on and laughs. Telefund participants receive a cooler if a donor pledges $500.

This year Telefund has set a goal of raising $1.4 million. Last year, the campaign raised $1,368,653 through 22,189 pledges. Thirty percent of K-State donors make gifts at Telefund.

"While each college has its own formula, nearly all of Telefund's gifts support students via scholarships and educational programs," Dowell said.

Dowell said most universities use automated dialers and paid callers. K-State avoids that approach because of the lost benefit to alumni and students. Many students find summer jobs or internship opportunities at Telefund.

"Telefund on a resume means a lot because so many people have a high regard for what goes on here," Dowell said.

"This experience will put you one step ahead in the job market."

Telefund can use up to 86 phones each night. If a phone is empty, that equates to about $850 in lost donations for the foundation, Dowell said. He said he hopes this doesn't happen very often.

In a recent survey, 95 percent of callers said they would call again for Telefund. Of the remaining 5 percent, 3 percent were graduating, so only 2 percent of callers would not call again. About 75 percent of callers are rookies.

"I'm a rookie and will call again for Telefund," Matt Shull, sophomore in psychology, said Sunday. "It's a lot more fun that I thought it would be. Plus, there's food."

During Dowell's 17 years at the foundation, there has been more than a $1 million change in annual giving.

"I have yet to meet a student who would turn down a scholarship. As long as those needs remain, Telefund and other foundation fund-raising programs will continue as campus priorities," Dowell said.

"The more gifts Telefund generates, the more students will benefit from alumni philanthropy, and the stronger the university will become."

Radio station embarks on tuition promotion

By Jessica Pitts
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Scholarships help, financial aid is a lifesaver, but the radio station might be the answer to one student's prayers.

Big Kat KJCK-FM 97.5 and its sister station, KQLA-FM 103.5, are going to pay one student's spring tuition – and all they ask in return is that students listen to the radio station for the announcement of registration locations.

"We were looking for that one nifty promotion idea," Wende Horton, program director, said, "and this one made sense. We know that the cost of the college is high and it keeps going up and up. This promotion gives one lucky student the chance to ease some of the pain of paying that money."

Each day, the two stations will announce a secret, live broadcast location where students can sign up. Although contestants are allowed to register each day, they can only register one time at each remote.

"We have had a great turnout so far," Horton said.

Chad Allen, morning show host for the Big Kat, said his live broadcast from Library Discount Liquor on Thursday night was busy.

"We had a lot of people come out and register," Allen said. "They know what is going on. They come to the live broadcast looking to register. It is not hard to give away more than $1,400."

To be eligible, students must be a Kansas resident and be full-time students on the Manhattan campus.

The winner will be reimbursed for up to 12 credit hours, or $1,430.

The live broadcast will continue once daily until Friday, Horton said, and the contest will conclude that evening with one final chance to register at Rusty's Last Chance Restaurant & Saloon.

"It will end with a huge party at Rusty's," she said. "We figured that was a great way to get people excited about giving away that much money."

Students can register from 5 to 7 p.m. at Rusty's on Friday, and the winner will be announced at 7 p.m., Horton said. Students must be present to win.

TO THE POINT

Students will benefit from Lafene move

Lafene Health Center is finally moving. Whether that's a good thing or a bad thing hasn't been voiced by much of the student body.

The long-talked-about rumor of Lafene moving, then not moving, then moving again has raised the issue of if this move will serve students better. One thing it will do, in a time of a budget crisis, is create additional office space for professors and also provide more classrooms without having to construct a new building.

To the point is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

Lafene's new location will provide better facilities without raising privilege fees. Parking there also will not be limited to the privileged few that find spots.

With the relocated facilities, parking will be more abundant, and students will be able to drive to the new location as opposed to making the trek across campus while they are sick.

The relocation to the second floor of Mercy Regional Health Center on Sunset Avenue is expected to be completed this summer and should be ready by the time students return in the fall.

Lafene employees have long been anxious to move into a new facility that would create more room to work. Lafene has been very accommodating in its commitment to provide the best service to students by providing transportation to the health center through the shuttle service – helping calm the complaints of it being moved away.

Another change that comes with the new location is the eventual destruction of Denison Hall. A building that has never garnered popularity for its architectural integrity will finally see its demise after the university works out final plans for that issue.

Teachers and students will benefit from the additional space as well as from the centrally located building on campus. It's a wise move on behalf of the health center and the university.

WAR RESOLUTIONS

Bush needs to concentrate on peacekeeping

FLETCHER JACOBS

Are you like me? Do you make New Year's Resolutions? I do it every year, even though I know that inevitably they will be broken sometime mid-February. But I always believe that is the year that "Men's Health" finally leads me to those cover-model abs I've always been searching for. Call me an optimist. Of course, between you, me, and that Jr. Bacon Cheeseburger over there: well, this one never really has a chance.

George W. Bush evidently also does this. At a wedding this break, one of my close friends told me he'd heard the President's resolutions the other day.

The resolutions? "Quit eating cheeseburgers and try to find a peaceful resolution to the war in Iraq," he said.

"Well, at least he has his priorities in line," I mused, "but isn't he worried about losing the Beef Council support?" Maybe it was the open bar (probably since it really wasn't that funny) but we both laughed.

Funny, though, I didn't really feel like laughing. I am pretty sure he didn't really either. His brother is in the Marines. Not as easy to chant, "Let's just go kick some ass" when it is someone you know doing the fighting.

The reason is that Bush isn't really trying to keep that resolution. Today, the U.N. weapon inspectors give their weapons report to the U.N. Security Council – something the world sees as a sort of progress report.

The administration has long accused Saddam Hussein of lying and hiding things from the inspectors and is going to try and use this as the trigger to start a war. the calmest voice in the Bush administration, Secretary of State Powell, has now dropped that stance and says the time to make a decision has drawn nigh.

Do you hear that constant throbbing in the background? That boom-boom isn't another Fort Riley drill. That's the beat of war drums.

But why are we so hell-bent on action? Certainly, that is the question that the world, and our allies, are asking us. Germany, France, and Russia have all openly said there is not yet a case for supporting war in Iraq. Their citizens agree.

Demonstrations last weekend across the globe were well attended from Washington, D.C. to Damascus by opponents of the war. Pakistan and Bulgaria, both members of the Security Council and willingly U.S. backers, have said we need to give inspectors a chance. Even Britain, our staunchest supporter, is split, with half of the population not wanting to go along. Even we've slowed support down with a recent "Washington Post-ABC News" poll says that seven out of 10 Americans want to give the inspectors more time.

But troops are already being deployed. We'd been in discussions to secure Iraqi oil and have said that is issue number one in any action according to the United Kingdoms' Guardian. The press makes this sound as if we have reached a point of no backing down. We seem content to push on through with the limited ally support we have. The drum continues to beat.

Look, Saddam isn't on the top of anyone's "Favorite Dictators" list. The world won't miss him when he is gone. But this a war we are talking about. innocent Iraqis with an already weak public infrastructure are the ones who will be harmed, not to mention our own service men who would be asked to risk their lives.

Diplomacy should be allowed to run its course. Yes, we need to push this issue, but as part of the world community, not on our own. Why can't we try to see this through peacefully as most of the rest of the world wants to do? Our country is being viewed as imperialistic and war mongering across the globe because of our push to ignite this. The inspectors have recently received the rights to talk with Iraqi scientists. We need to give them more time. If they find that "smoking gun" and we have proof, then this becomes a different ball game. But until then, we need to wait.

Tomorrow night, Bush will give his State of the Union address. It is expected that a case for war will be made (there go those drums again). As citizens, this is a time we need to watch the speech despite our schedules. At least get informed of what was said later and get some reaction – not just from the American press, but see what other countries are saying. Decide for yourself your opinions on this issue.

I just hope Bush is better at keeping his resolutions than I am.

Handy-dandy guide helps for success in homework

AIMEE NOEL

It's the first full week of classes. Are you ready? Back to friends, fun, class and homework. Ick, homework. It's one of those things that everyone dreads.

Sucking you into work rather than play, draining all the fun out of life, homework is possibly one of the most cunning works of evil devised by Satan himself. Who else could come up with 30 calculus problems due the next day or a 20-page term paper? I hope no human mind could be so sadistic.

But should you find that the due date for homework has come, and your paper still lies untyped or equation sheet unsolved, do not despair.

There is an effective method for solving such issues that was pounded into our heads in high school. Yes, it's that good old four-step, handy dandy problem-solving method. And I thought I'd never use it.

First off, determine the problem. That's rather easy, we've done that already. Somehow amidst the snowball fights, hours of DVDs and naps, you've forgotten to do your homework.

Secondly, find possible solutions. This is the fun part. You get to work on your acting skills and list of excuses. My llama ate it, I was hit by a pizza delivery person and it's stuck to their fender, aliens abducted it, or the classic "oops, I forgot," are all possible excuses, though they'll not get you out of the F that accompanies absent homework. Or even technology-related excuses for the modern college student, though if you use them, the people with legitimate technology excuses (like me) kind of get the shaft.

Thirdly, implement the solution – i.e., use your excuse.

Fourth step, repeat. OK, you might want to skip this step, since if you do this repeatedly, you will flunk out of college and live your life either flipping burgers or handing out smiley face stickers until you die.

Of course, there is the option of actually doing your homework and turning it in late for pity credit, an option not to be overlooked, as I have found many teachers will at least give you partial credit for late papers.

Striving for perfection may be all well and good, but perfection is an illusion and distracts from happiness. Stress will kill you if you don't enjoy life and live a little, and the undergraduate years are the best times of our lives and meant to be enjoyed.

So go on out and enjoy the snow, or possibly mud by the time this is printed, chase a random squirrel up a tree, attend a Joe Fund concert or play Monopoly until three in the morning.

Whatever you do, don't forget to have fun, and while never doing homework is stupid, a single missed or late assignment is not going to be the death of your GPA either. And don't forget the handy dandy problem-solving guide for all of your late homework needs.

THE EMINEM SHOW

Reader's Choice Music Awards brings rapper accolades, but lacks true winner

By JJ Duncan
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

If the Chinese zodiac were determined by music, 2002 would be the year of the white rapper.

Eminem was chosen for best single, best hip-hop album and artist of the year, and if there were a category for musicians starring in movies, he would probably win that, too.

But 2002 was bigger than Eminem. While critics are agreeing that it was an excellent year for music, no one has a clear choice for which albums were the most important for the industry.

The White Stripes brought garage rock to the mainstream, but Christina Aguilera will sell more albums with her sub-par "Beautiful." Indie rock saw the light of radio play, but now too many people think it all sounds like Jimmy Eat World and Dashboard Confessional.

Hip-hop has had one of its most dynamic years ever, but a fissure seemingly has split hip-hop into those produced by the Neptunes or Timbaland, and those who actually rap.

Here are the results of how our campus viewed music over the past year. About 270 people voted in the Collegian Reader's Choice Music Awards, and these are the results.

Best Single — Eminem: "Lose Yourself"

Look, if you had one shot to make a song so popular it drives your movie to number one and gets played twice an hour on every mainstream pop station for a month, would you capture it or just let it slip?

The somewhat positive message of "Lose Yourself" combined with an unforgettable chorus and Eminem's signature staccatto rhymes made for one of the most played and most loved songs of 2002.

Whether you loved it or hated it, chances are that sometime in the last few months you've sang "You better lose yourself in the music..." under your breath at least once or twice.

—Runner-up for best single - Vanessa Carlton: "1,000 Miles"
—Collegian Critic's choice for best single - No Doubt: "Hella Good"

Best Hip-Hop Album — Eminem: "The Eminem Show"

Few artists ever have a year as good to them as 2002 was for Eminem.

In November, he became only the second artist to have a number one album while starring in the number one movie. His face was unavoidable, and so was his music.

Not everyone is behind the album though. Lafayette Childs II, music director for the Urban Show on KSDB 91.9-FM, said that while he respects Eminem as a lyricist, he didn't get into "The Eminem Show."

"He's one of the greatest, if not the greatest, rapper as a lyricist, but his content doesn't really float my boat," said Childs, senior in human studies and sociology.

Childs said that Eminem's underground work better displays his skill, while the singles he releases are hip-pop tracks made to make money.

This year a clear rift developed between rappers who focus on lyrics and rappers who focus on production. Childs said he sides with true lyricists and tires of the ubiquitous presence of producers such as the Neptunes and Timbaland.

"I can see right through good production," he said. "You can have good production and the lyrics will be whack, and I won't like it at all."

—Runner-up for best hip-hop album - Nelly: "Nellyville" —Child's choice for best hip-hop album - Jurassic 5: "Power in Numbers"
—Collegian Critic's choice for best hip-hop album - The Roots: "Phrenology"

Best Pop Album — No Doubt: "Rock Steady"

In the closest race of the Reader's Choice Awards, No Doubt edged out Pink and Avril Lavigne for best pop album.

Boy bands and pop divas were clearly the 2002 music paraiahs this year as the popularity of Britney, Christina, and boys with tip-frosted hair plummeted. Anyone who owns a Korn T-shirt is now allowed to cheer. The pop replacements have drawn from subcultures and good producers to redefine cool.

Avril rips off punk. Pink borrows, if not steals, from punk and goth. And No Doubt keeps its punk roots in its looks while boasting the kind of slick production and catchy pop music that draws the 10-15 year-old market.

It all raises the question: What is the greater evil? Is it sincerely juvenile, brainless pop from the likes of Britney Spears, or is it more grown-up and skilled rip-off artists? For now at least, I'm willing to forget that No Doubt used to be a So-Cal ska band, and shake my ass to "Hella Good."

—Runner-up for best pop album - Pink: "Missundaztood"
—Collegian Critic's choice for best pop album - No Doubt: "Rock Steady"

Best Indie Rock Album — The White Stripes: "White Blood Cells"

The White Stripes led the way to a garage rock revival this year that was backed up by the likes of the Strokes and the Hives.

The red and white-clad images of Jack and Meg White rocking out have invaded MTV and magazines. Their singles, "Fell In Love With A Girl" and "Dead Leaves on the Dirty Ground" grabbed a decent amount of airplay as well.

Jessica Wisneski, host of the Underground on KSDB 91.9-FM said that while she likes the sound of the band, her tastes in indie rock are varied. Wisneski, senior in English, said some of her favorite artists from 2002 were Manda and the Marbles, the Flaming Lips and Thursday.

2002 was also the year indie became mainstream. Wisneski said it's frustrating at times because people latch onto one song, such as "In the Middle" by Jimmy Eat World and judge the band based on that, or a bad indie rock band becomes popular like Dashboard Confessional.

"All the bands you like are suddenly cool and it sucks because everyone suddenly wants to listen to it, and those bands have been around for years," she said.

—Runner-up for best indie-rock album - The Flaming Lips: "Yoshimi Versus the Pink Robots"
—Wisneski's pick for best indie-rock album - Thursday: "Full Collapse"
—Collegian Critic's choice for best indie-rock album - Bright Eyes: "Lifted..."

Best Hard Rock Album — Hoobastank: "Hoobastank"

Touring with, and sounding reminiscent of, Incubus is sure to help a fledgling band's career, and Hoobastank's formula for success in the last year has entailed just that.

But much harder rock is nipping at the band's heels. Former members of Kyuss and Dave Grohl released a stellar Queens of the Stone Age album this year with "Songs for the Deaf," and more people are tuning into the heavy sound of Hatebreed.

Clint McAllister, guitarist for the Bearded Assholes, said Hatebreed's combination of metal, punk and hardcore make for one of the best hard rock bands around.

"They've got more edge than a lot of things that are being called metal or hard rock, and they mix in political statements as well," he said.

—Runner-up for best hard rock album - Queens of the Stone Age: "Songs for the Deaf"
—McAllister's choice for best hard rock album - Shadows Fall: "Art of Balance"
—Collegian Critic's choice for best hard rock album - Queens of the Stone Age: "Songs for the Deaf"

Other Winners

- Best Alternative Rock Album —Red Hot Chili Peppers: "By the Way"
  —Runner-up for best alternative rock album - Coldplay: "A Rush of Blood to the Head"
  —Collegian Critic's choice for best alternative rock album - Beck: "Sea Changes"
- Best Rock Album — Dave Matthews Band: "Busted Stuff"
  —Runner-up for best rock album - Weezer: "Maladroit"
  —Collegian Critic's choice for best rock album - Bruce Springsteen: "The Rising"
- Best Country Album —The Dixie Chicks: "Home"
  —Runner-up for best country album - Faith Hill: "Cry"
  —Collegian Critic's choice for best country album - The Meat Purveyors: "All Relationships are Doomed to Fail"
- Best Electronica Album — Moby: "18"

Billy Joel released from hospital day after his car crashed into tree

"Piano Man" Billy Joel was hospitalized for several hours early Sunday after smashing his car into a tree along a highway on far eastern Long Island.

A hospital spokesman confirmed that the singer was released Sunday morning but would not comment on Joel's injuries.

The 53-year-old Rock and Roll Hall of Famer had swerved into the tree as he was driving his Mercedes Benz in Sag Harbor late Saturday, said Sag Harbor Village Police Chief Thomas Fabiano.

AMONG THE BEST

Nicole Donnert | COLLEGIAN

Kendra Wecker goes up for a shot against Texas during the first half of K-State's win over the Longhorns on Saturday at Bramlage Coliseum. Wecker scored 27 points during the 71-69 win over Texas.

Tracking the Cats through the best season start in school history

1-0

Nov. 15 | BALL STATE

The Cardinals led by as many as eight in the first half, but K-State rallied for a 71-61 victory in the first round of the preseason WNIT. Kendra Wecker had 20 points and 12 rebounds, Nicole Ohlde had 18 points and 16 rebounds, and Brie Madden added 10 points and 11 rebounds.

2-0

Nov. 17 | GEORGIA TECH

The Yellow Jackets held Laurie Koehn, the Cats' best 3-point shooter, to two 3-point goals, but Megan Mahoney hit 4-of-5 3-pointers for 16 points and had 13 assists to lead K-State to a 83-59 win in the second round of the preseason WNIT.

3-0

Nov. 20 | USC

Kendra Wecker finished with a game-high 24 points and 12 rebounds for the Wildcats, tying a career-high in scoring and Nicole Ohlde added 19 points and 10 rebounds for K-State, which advanced to the WNIT championship with a 73-61 win over the Trojans.

4-0

Nov. 24 | PENN STATE

Sophomores Kendra Wecker and Laurie Koehn combined for 49 points, and K-State beat Penn State, 88-66, in the championship game of the Preseason WNIT, before 6,052 at Bramlage Coliseum.

5-0

Nov. 29 | TEMPLE

Nicole Ohlde had a season-high 28 points and 15 rebounds as K-State came back for a 72-65 victory over Temple in the first round of the Stanford Invitational. Kendra Wecker added 16 points, and Megan Mahoney had 13 points and a season-high 11 rebounds.

5-1

Nov. 30 | NO. 7 STANFORD

The Wildcats held a four-point lead 13 minutes into the contest on 9-of-16 shooting, but Stanford's Kelley Suminski scored a season-high 18 points as the Cardinal upset K-State 63-57 to win the Stanford Invitational.

6-1

Dec. 2 | ARKANSAS-PINE BLUFF

Laurie Koehn scored 23 points, while Kendra Wecker and Megan Mahoney added 22 apiece, as K-State set a school record for points in a 115-37 win over Arkansas-Pine Bluff.

7-1

Dec. 6| MIDDLE TENNESSEE STATE

Laurie Koehn had 25 points, including a tournament-record seven three-pointers, to lead K-State past Middle Tennessee State 79-61 in the first round of the Commerce Bank Classic.

8-1

Dec. 7 | WEBER STATE

K-State used a 22-1 run to close the first half, and the Wildcats went on to a 60-36 victory over Weber State in the championship game of the Commerce Bank Wildcat Classic to secure the team's second tournament of the season.

9-1

Dec. 12 | WISCONSIN-GREEN BAY

Kendra Wecker's career-high 31 points helped K-State to a 80-75 victory over the Phoenix. The game was still within reach until Megan Mahoney's two free throws with 4.2 seconds left capped the game's scoring.

10-1

Dec. 20 | WESTERN MICHIGAN

Megan Mahoney finished with 20 points, leading five players who scored in double figures as K-State eased to a 92-75 win before 6,648 at Bramlage Coliseum. Nicole Ohlde finished with 16 points, 12 rebounds and six assists for the winners, and Kendra Wecker added 16 points and nine assists.

11-1

Dec. 28 | NORTHERN ILLINOIS

Kendra Wecker scored 25 points and grabbed 10 rebounds, recording the 16th 20-point game of her career and the sixth of the season as K-State beat Northern Illinois 63-58. It was also Wecker's fifth double-double of the year and 17th in her career.

12-1

Jan. 3 | | WESTERN ILLINOIS

Nicole Ohlde had 26 points and eight rebounds and Kendra Wecker scored 23 as K-State dominated early and never trailed on the way to winning its seventh straight, 84-40.

13-1

Jan. 5 | IOWA

Laurie Koehn, who made her first start after missing two games with an ankle injury, broke a school record with 10 3-pointers to lead K-State past Iowa 103-60 in the Big 12/Big Ten challenge.

14-1

Jan. 8 | KANSAS

Kendra Wecker was a miserable 1-for-7 inside the 3-point arc, but from long range, she was perfect. The sophomore went 5-for-5 from long range and scored 18 points in K-State's 88-49 win.

15-1

Jan. 11 | NO. 24/23 COLORADO

K-State held Colorado to 17-percent shooting in the first half and 26 percent from the field in the game, as the Wildcats beat Colorado, 61-36. Kendra Wecker had a game-high 18 points and 10 rebounds, while Nicole Ohlde had 15 points and Megan Mahoney finished with 14.

16-1

Jan. 15 | IOWA STATE

Nicole Ohlde scored 18 of her game-high 20 points in the second half, and Kendra Wecker finished with 17 points and 11 rebounds, as K-State battled back from a 10-2 deficit to win, 68-60.

17-1

Jan. 19 | Nebraska

Nicole Ohlde made 9-of-10 shots and scored a game-high 23 points, and Kendra Wecker added 22 points and six steals as K-State beat Nebraska, 88-54, for the first time in eight years.

18-1

Jan. 25 | NO. 17/16 TEXAS

Kendra Wecker scored 17 of her game-high 27 points in the first half, and K-State held on to beat Texas, 71-69, to grab the Big 12 lead and set a new mark for the best start in school history.

Cats knock set one mark, begin looking for more

By Dan Smith
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It was fitting that Gov. Kathleen Sebelius was on hand Saturday afternoon at Bramlage Coliseum.

No. 3/3 K-State welcomed Kansas' new governor to Manhattan with a stately effort on its home floor against No. 16/17 Texas.

Before the contest, the Cats presented Sebelius with a bouquet, and 40 minutes later, K-State (18-1, 5-0) walked off the floor with a 71-69 win and the best start in school history, one win better than last year's 17-1 start.

"It's the kind of statistic that these players deserve to be a part of and have earned," Coach Deb Patterson said. "Not only have they put us in the position to have the best start in school history, but I think they have literally changed the face of this program."

The hot start comes just two years removed from a 12-16 finish during the 2000-01 season that included a 2-14 league mark. This season, the Cats are sniffing a conference championship for the first time since K-State shared the Big 8 title in 1986-87 under Matilda Mossman.

Several other school records could fall this season if the Cats hang tough during the second half of the conference schedule.

K-State's current 13-game winning streak is four games shy of the school record, set in 1982 by Lynn Hickey's 26-6 team. That Wildcat squad went on to record the school's best postseason finish, an Elite Eight run in the NCAA Tournament.

Those Cats were nearly

NFL | Bucs take Super Bowl in upset, 48-21

Super Bowl MVP Dexter Jackson had two interceptions, as did Dwight Smith, who returned both of his picks for touchdowns, as the Tampa Bay Buccaneers beat the Oakland Raiders 48-21.

Simeon Rice had two of the Bucs' five sacks as Tampa romped to a 20-3 halftime lead then scored two quick third-quarter touchdowns.

That rendered futile a late comeback by the Raiders that included a touchdown on a blocked punt and a 48-yard TD pass from league MVP Rich Gannon to Jerry Rice.

Credit the win also to the 39-year-old Gruden, who left Oakland a year ago for Tampa Bay in what seemed at the time far too much in draft picks and cash — $8 million to be exact.

Tennis | Agassi wins 4th Australian Open

Andre Agassi has won the past three Australian Opens in which he has played.

The 32-year-old Agassi overwhelmed Rainer Schuettler right from the start and breezed to his fourth Australian Open title 6-2, 6-2, 6-1 Sunday, becoming the oldest man to win a Grand Slam singles crown in 31 years.

Agassi won his eighth Grand Slam championship. And the victory might also have been enough to lure his wife, Steffi Graf, out of retirement.

Agassi had said earlier that if he won this tournament, Graf would be his partner for mixed doubles in the French Open. After the final point, Agassi gave a quick wink into the stands at Graf, who won 22 Grand Slam singles titles before she stopped playing three years ago.

Royals give youth a new definition

TOM FONTANA

There are two words in the English language that will drive any Kansas City Royals fan absolutely insane.

Youth movement.

Wait a second, did I admit to being a Royals fan? Yes, that's right, I'm as diehard as they come when it comes to the "boys in blue."

I am not a fair-weather fan like 95 percent of the people in Kansas City. I have stuck with this team through thick and thin – mostly thin – and management just keeps breaking my heart with these youth movements.

Now, I know it's early for baseball talk, but I just can't get past some of the moves the geniuses at the Truman Sports Complex have made this off-season to create this team of excellence.

Last Thursday, the Royals picked up veteran pitcher James Baldwin, who is almost 32 years old.

Well they must have acquired someone young that can produce this season.

Nope.

The trio of Desi Relaford, 30, Albie Lopez, 31, and catcher Mike DiFelice, 34, is the talent the Royals have managed to find.

So what's the point other than the Royals are going to stink this year? If you're going to plan a rebuilding process behind a youth movement, commit to it. Don't bail out and sign a handful of tired old hands who could care less about putting up numbers to save a dying franchise.

The Royals would be dead last in every statistic this year had they stuck with some of the young talent they have, but the confidence those guys could have gained would have been priceless.

I'm not one to give up on a team, but I have never been so unenthused about a Royals team before. I am usually optimistic prior to the season, which always comes back to bite me, but there is no hope this year.

Mike Sweeney and Joe Randa, two of the nicest guys in baseball, have publicly questioned their employer this winter. Not to mention the team's five-tool player Carlos Beltran has no interest in signing a long-term deal. I can't say I blame him.

The Royals will lose players like Sweeney, Beltran and Randa, just like they lost up and coming stars Jermaine Dye and Johnny Damon a couple years ago. It can't only be blamed on the economics of baseball anymore. Owner David Glass simply needs to open his fat wallet. Just a little bit.

Until Glass decides to dish out some cash, there is a team right here in Manhattan that will be fun to watch. The players play for the love of the game, not for cash.

For the few Royals fans who still remain, don't give up yet. If you do, they will disappear before our eyes.

But, I'm afraid to say, if you want to watch a competitive team, you'll have to head to The Frank.

Rosenberg rises to occasion against BYU

By Wes Marfield
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Stepping into a new role is always tough for an athlete. Taking the spot left by a champion makes things much more difficult.

Sophomore Maria Rosenberg knows the challenges of that process first hand.

Rosenberg started her first ever match at No. 1 tennis singles on Friday against BYU, taking over for 2002 Big 12 Player of the Year Alena Jecminkova, lost to graduation following last year's season.

Down 2-1 in the first set against the Central Region's No. 8 player, Dominique Reynolds, Rosenberg rallied back to take the next five games and win the first set, 6-4. She led the second set throughout, beating Reynolds, 7-5, and helping the Cats to a 4-3 victory over the Cougars.

For Rosenberg, the key to dealing with her new role was to keep it from distracting her.

"In the beginning I thought about it," Rosenberg said. "But when the match started, I forgot that I was No. 1, and it didn't really

FIRE | Congregation copes with church building loss

That work was not preserved at 700 Vattier, but rather in a fireproof safe with God, Berry told his congregation Sunday.

Sam Burleigh, church member for two years, said the initial sadness of seeing his church in flames has lessened.

"When I first heard about the fire, I was shocked," he said. "Now, I am not discouraged. We are just pressing on."

In hopes of preserving some tangible memories of the old church, Berry will be creating a CD photo album of baptismal and repentance ceremonies that took place in the five years the United Pentecostal Church has inhabited the building.

"No one can take away the feelings you felt in that place," Berry said.

For now, the church's first priority is to look for a building to rent for the eight months it will take to build a new place of worship. Berry said the church might look to build the new church in a new location with a new name.

The previous sanctuary had the ability to seat 260 people but attendance has tripled in the last five years. Berry challenged his church to shift its focus from having a presentable building to witnessing to the people of Manhattan.

"Sometimes shaking is good for us," Berry said. "We have to rally to the cause. God has taken us out of our comfort zone. This congregation is united, this place is tormented, this place is looking for the biggest revival Manhattan has seen."

LAFENE | Student health center prepares to relocate

The plan is to tear down Denison once the classrooms and offices are transferred from Denison to Lafene. However, no final decisions have been made on the future of the current Denison building.

The move also should allow Lafene to be more organized and have a little more elbow room to work, Zweimiller said. Krause said the move will help increase the number of classrooms available as well.

"There is a need for additional classroom and office space, and now Lafene will have more opportunity to expand to accommodate their future needs," Krause said.

Lafene employees said they are confident the move will be beneficial to all of Lafene's users. The center will be more easily accessible situated on one floor rather than two. Additional parking also will make it more convenient for students who drive to the center, officials said.

Zweimiller said there will be no change in price or service once the center relocates. The only change will be the location.

Some students, however, are not as excited about the move. The relocation means a trip off campus to pick up a prescription or make an appointment.

Julie Hass, freshman in business, said it will be harder for her and possibly other students because they will not be able to walk in between classes or make an appointment to come in while they are already on campus.

"It might benefit some, but, for me, I think it will be less convenient when Lafene moves off campus," she said.

For those worried about the walk, transportation will be provided. Lafene is planning to accommodate students' needs by enhancing the shuttle service to provide transportation for those who need it.

Zweimiller said plans are in place to continue services for those who need it during the moving process.

It is not certain how long the actual move will take, but Lafene will continue to stay open and provide services for students.

"We plan to do everything we can to assist students for those who need care," Zweimiller said.

PROTESTS | Groups demonstrate for awareness

this," she said.

Marwa Khamis, freshman in pre-pharmacy, participates to show people there is a real problem.

"This is to show awareness. Generally, people don't know exactly what this war is for," she said.

The demonstrations are organized in conjunction with many individuals from campus groups, as well as outside ones. The Manhattan Alliance for Peace and Justice communicates to these people through an e-mail listserv that can be accessed through its Web site, mapj.org.

Besides the protests every Saturday, from 4:30-5:30 p.m. every Tuesday in front of the K-State Alumni Center, people will gather to continue their quest for peace.

This Tuesday, before President Bush's State of the Union Address, the group will have a poster-making party in the Union to prepare slogans for the ongoing protests.

As the threat of war nears, these activists hope to get support from the community and help toward their cause of peace.

"Everybody here is supporting peace," Wake said. "The protest here is just as important as the bigger ones."

unstoppable at Ahearn Field House, then K-State's home arena. K-State won 31 straight during a two-year stretch from December 1981 to 1983.

Patterson has made it a point to recapture that sort of home-court dominance. The Cats own a 16-game streak that dates back to a 76-68 loss to Oklahoma in February, 2002.

"You have to hold court at home," Patterson said after the Cats' win over Texas at Bramlage gave K-State sole possession of first place in the Big 12.

"It feels good in that respect. In the overall scheme of things, we understand that this league is long and it's hard, but it feels very good to establish that we weren't going to be upset at home."

The Big 12 Conference slate will present more challenges this season, but if K-State is able to respond, it could reach the program's top milestone.

Judy Akers' Cats went 28-6 in 1975-76 to post the school's best winning percentage at .823. Nineteen games into the 2002-03 season, this year's team has a .948 mark.

"Anything that they are able to achieve is very special as far as I'm concerned in the Kansas State record books," Patterson said.

Those books figure to include more references to this year's team, Patterson said, thanks to the type of effort a sold-out Bramlage Coliseum witnessed Saturday afternoon.

"I'm really proud of our team for their performance to this point in time of the season," Patterson said. "I'm very excited to see the character that this team brought to the floor today. I hope it's something that we'll continue to build off of."

matter anymore."

In general, Rosenberg was happy with the way she played.

"Overall, I'm pleased with my performance," she said. "I could have played a little more aggressive, but it wasn't so bad."

Coach Steve Bietau attributes Rosenberg's success to her determination.

"It was her first match at No. 1, but it's a mistake to underestimate Maria," Bietau said. "She always competes well. She had some difficulties overhitting the ball and finishing points. However, in spite of those things, she was able to get a win."

As a freshman last season, Rosenberg turned in the team's best record, 19-9, and was runner-up in the Big 12 Conference's No. 4 singles tournament. The Manhattan High School product also went undefeated in her senior year of high school, 33-0, winning the 6A state title.

"It's just her basic competitive nature to be able to grind out points that makes the difference for her," Bietau said.

Matt Elliott | COLLEGIAN

Maria Rosenberg of the women's tennis team returns a serve during her singles match against Dominique Reynolds of Brigham Young. Rosenberg defeated Reynolds 6-4, 7-5, which led No. 61 K-State to its second victory over No. 41 Brigham Young.

The Cats return to action Saturday against Southwest Missouri State, an NCAA Tournament qualifier last season, at Ahearn Field House.

Pleased with the outcome of the BYU dual, Bietau said there is still room for improvement.

"I'm happy that she got the win there," he said. "We saw some good things in her match and plenty of things to work on. We have a lot of tennis left to play."

As for Rosenberg, she isn't thinking about the future.

"I'm just going to try to win the matches I play and do my best," she said.

U.N. wants more time in Iraq

U.N. report bolsters U.S. case on Iraq weapons; Powell says time is short

By Edith M. Lederer
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

UNITED NATIONS – U.N. weapons inspectors bolstered the United States' case Monday that Iraq has failed to cooperate with them wholeheartedly, but also called for at least a "few months" to give the process time to avert a war.

The United States rejected Iraq's response to U.N. disarmament demands as inadequate, with Secretary of State Colin Powell warning that Saddam Hussein does not have "much more time" to "turn on the light" about his weapons programs. China, Russia and France countered that the reports support the need for inspectors to continue to do their work.

In a toughly worded critique 60 days after inspections began, chief inspector Hans Blix charged that Iraq has never genuinely accepted U.N. resolutions demanding its disarmament and warned that "cooperation on substance" is necessary for a peaceful solution.

"Iraq appears not to have come to a genuine acceptance, not even today, of the disarmament that was demanded of it," Blix said.

He said Iraq failed to provide inspectors evidence supporting claims that they indeed had destroyed their weapons, such as the deadly nerve agent VX, anthrax and Scud-type missiles with a range of more than 90 miles.

Blix said his teams now believe Iraq's claims that it was unsuccessful in producing VX were untrue. "There are indications that the agent was weaponized," Blix said. Inspectors have also discovered a mustard gas precursor during recent inspections.

Company to bring 250 jobs

Auth-Florence moves forward with plans for new plant site in Manhattan

By James Hurla
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Manhattan will be the home to an Auth-Florence manufacturing plant, the Chicago-based company announced last week.

The plant is expected to bring 250 jobs and a more than $7-million payroll to the city within three years.

"For a community our size, that's a significant economic impact," said Lyle Butler, president of the Manhattan Area Chamber of Commerce.

Auth-Florence Mfg. manufactures commercial and residential mailboxes for centralized distribution and collection of mail and packages. The Empire State Building in New York, the John Hancock Building in Chicago, Manhattan Town Center and K-State are among the company's clients.

The company looked at 56 communities in 12 states and two foreign countries before deciding on Manhattan, Butler said.

The available work force and central location for distribution were among the factors considered in the selection process, according to a press release from the Kansas Department of Commerce and Housing, which helped the company identify possible locations.

"It was clear they were impressed with the people they met in the Manhattan area," Butler said. "They felt they had been very warmly received."

Most of the workforce will be hired from the Manhattan area, the press release stated. This will include 175 jobs related to manufacturing, along with openings for management, administration, engineering, sales and marketing, Butler said.

The city of Manhattan offered the company an incentive package, which included tax abatement on real and personal property, a forgivable loan for 25 acres of land and some relocation expenses.

The plant will be built in Manhattan's Corporate Technology Park near the Manhattan Regional Airport. Construction is expected to begin in March.

When most people think of Girl Scouts, cookies often come to mind.

But for several students, the group is much more.

"Girl Scouts is important because it teaches life skills and helps young girls to develop into leaders of the future, make friends for a lifetime and lets them explore their interests," said Jennifer Rush, committee manager of the Girl Scouts of Kaw Valley Kaw Valley Council.

Kari Poulain, sophomore in accounting and finance, and Meghann Kueck, freshman in elementary education, hold their troop meetings at Marlatt Elementary School.

Poulain and Kueck have been scout leaders all year and are excited about their roles as leaders for young girls.

"It's fun and doesn't take much time, but you can really have a big impact on girls' lives, and they will remember you forever," Kueck said.

Rush said the national organization, The Girl Scouts of the United States of America, encourages college-aged women to become involved as scout leaders.

"We feel it is important because the girls we serve look up to college-aged girls and these college-aged girls give these younger scouts something to look forward to," she said.

While Poulain was once a scout herself, Kueck was not. But that doesn't mean Kueck is disadvantaged as a troop leader.

"It is kind of hard with cookie sales and such. I don't really know what's going on, but I'm an elementary education major so it's good experience for me," she said.

As the girls begin to arrive with their cookie order forms, two members start comparing sales numbers.

Poulain said there are major differences between when she was a scout – almost a decade ago – and now.

"There has been a decline in the number of girls in Girl Scouts today, which is kind of sad, but they seem more dedicated and into the activities we do," she said.

Mary Boswell, mother of Jaime Boswell, 7, a scout in Poulain and Kueck's troop, said she is glad her daughter is involved with the scout group.

Kari Poulain, sophomore in accounting and finance, and Girl Scout troop leader Karen Thege go over cookie sales at the scout's meeting Thursday night. Poulain and Meghann Kueck are two K-State students who help lead Girl Scout meetings for Troop 336.

"It's had a great impact on her life, just being involved with other girls," she said. "These girls have learned a lot of important things."

Sports-oriented atmosphere theme of new Aggieville bars

By Edie Hall
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Jeanel Drake | COLLEGIAN

Rusty Wilson was a manager of Kite's Bar and Grill before it closed in 1994 after 40 years in Aggieville. When it closed, Wilson bought the rights to the name. Next month, Wilson will reopen the bar and grill in its original location, where 12th Street Pub was located in Aggieville.

An old name will reappear in Aggieville soon.

When 12th Street Pub owner Tyler Olson decided to move to Kansas City, Rusty Wilson, owner of Rusty's Last Chance, Next Door and Other Side, took the opportunity to buy the property and bring back Kite's bar. Kite's was bought in 1994 and was renovated and renamed 12th Street Pub.

Wilson, who was a bartender and eventually a manager at Kite's before it was sold through bankruptcy, said he had some emotional ties to the place.

"I own the name Kite's, and that's where Kite's originally was – so how convenient," Wilson said.

The bar has now been closed for about two weeks. Wilson said Kite's would open in mid-February. He said when the bar reopened, it would retain some of the previous 12th Street Pub employees and would also be hiring some new staff.

Wilson said he would be adding a massive amount of sports photographs and attaching awnings similar to ones used in the past to ensure that the new Kite's captures the same atmosphere as the original bar.

Wilson said he'd also be designing the food menu and atmosphere to resemble that of the old Kite's.

"At Kite's, when you came in, everyone knew who you were – everyone greeted you," Wilson said. "You always felt welcome. Any K-Stater, whether they were present students, alumni or perspective students, could visit and feel a part of something, and that's what we will attempt to do again."

Although there may be some complaints about Wilson expanding his business, he said he looks at the situation as an example of the "land of opportunity."

"I'm just an entrepreneur trying to provide for supply and demand," Wilson said. "I feel Rusty's is a completely different place than Kite's. I've never bought out a bar, I've just expanded into vacant buildings – I've just expanded my current business."

Wilson said he's never forced another bar to close

NEWS OF THE WEIRD

Dum-Dum trail leads police to bank robber with sweet tooth

By Chuck Shepherd
UNIVERSAL PRESS SYNDICATE

Michael Brown, 33, was arrested in Marked Tree, Ark., in January and charged with burglarizing the lobby of the Marked Tree Bank after security cameras caught him hauling away a clock radio, a CD player and a handful of Dum-Dum suckers, which the bank has on hand for customers' children. The next morning, according to the Arkansas Democrat-Gazette, police followed a trail of Dum-Dum wrappers down Frisco Street, across the railroad tracks, and into the mobile home park where Brown lives.

Exercising her rights

A Montana district judge ruled in January that for a homicide suspect with apparent multiple personalities, exercise of a Miranda right by one of them carries over to all the others.

Tessa Haley lawyered up when police sought to question her about the stabbing death of her roommate, and though police questioning ceased, Haley transformed into "Martha" and spontaneously confessed to the crime, according to officers.

Judge Thomas Honzel ruled that Martha's statements could not be used against Haley (although Haley is still free under existing law to argue that she is not responsible for Martha's crime).

Cutting edge research

A study by psychology professor Barry Jones, of Glasgow University, found that men and women who have had three beers perceive people of the opposite sex as 25 percent more attractive than they did before they started drinking.

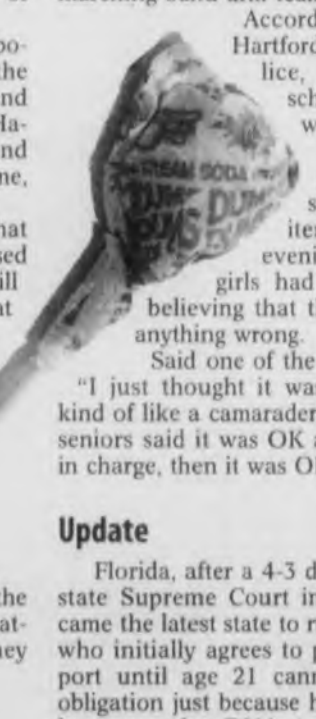
Latest rights

Australian Supreme Court Justice Barry O'Keefe rejected the challenge of a drug-possession suspect in November that his rights had been violated during his arrest.

Contrary to the suspect's contention, O'Keefe said when Rocky the police dog nuzzled the suspect's crotch, it was merely a "social gesture" that dogs habitually do, rather than an indecent assault.

People different from us

The Boston Globe profiled homeless philosopher Donald Keaney, 61, in December, describing his Walden-like existence near Brookline, Mass.



Keaney lives under a plastic tarp, warmed by several heavy blankets, but the rest of his possessions consist of about 10 years' worth of newspapers (New York Times, New York Daily News, New York Post, Wall Street Journal, Investors Business Daily, Boston Globe and Boston Herald) that are methodically filed and sealed in plastic bags and strewn around the ground as if they were chairs and tables.

Keaney, a political conservative, also attends protests, lectures and concerts, and has long been the beneficiary of a trust fund which he has chosen so far to ignore.

"Living in the woods, you can see life is very tragic," he told the Globe. "I don't know if I'm a misanthrope, but (people) have a lot of limitations."

Unclear concepts

Police in New Britain, Conn., confiscated a 50-foot-long pile of stolen items in November, the result of a ritual scavenger hunt of the Canettes, New Britain High School's all-girl marching band drill team.

According to The Hartford Courant, police, parents and school personnel were appalled that 42 girls could steal so many items in a single evening, but the girls had a hard time believing that they had done anything wrong.

Said one of the thieving girls: "I just thought it was a custom – kind of like a camaraderie thing. If the seniors said it was OK and they were in charge, then it was OK."

Update

Florida, after a 4-3 decision by the state Supreme Court in January, became the latest state to rule that a man who initially agrees to pay child support until age 21 cannot shed that obligation just because he subsequently proves by DNA testing that he could not be the kid's father.

Cathy Anderson had told police officer Michael Anderson twice that she was sure the kid was his, after which he agreed to pay $8,000 a year in support, but after the DNA test, he claimed that her assurance constituted "fraud," a claim that the Supreme Court thus rejected.

And the town council of Bend, Ore., formally prohibited spitting and defecating on its transit buses, as well as riders who emanate "a grossly repulsive odor."

Undignified death

A man acting as a tree-sitter to discourage logging operations in woods south of San Jose, Calif., fell out of the tree and was killed.

Journalism students to produce local television broadcasts

Students plan to air weekly public affairs programming on Channel 8, continue to brainstorm for future shows

By April Middleton
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Manhattan community will have more local television news coverage this semester than it has had for several years.

A cooperation between the A.Q. Miller School of Journalism and the Educational Communications Center is resulting in student-produced programming on Channel 8.

For now, three programs will be produced through this cooperation.

The first, "Manhattan Matters," is a weekly public affairs show, designed to cover the problems and needs of the city and community.

"Manhattan Matters" will air Feb. 28 and continue for four weeks.

The second production, which airs for four weeks after "Manhattan Matters," will be a series of television newscasts.

The newscasts, "Wildcat Connection," will be created by broadcast journalism classes.

The final two weeks of the semester will be program ideas developed by students in a practicum class.

Bambi Landholm, visiting assistant professor, said the students are brainstorming now, but the programs could be anything from a Battle of the Bands program to something like "Insomniac."

Landholm said broadcast times are to be determined by the ECC.

All programs are scheduled to tenatively run early Friday evening with a rebroadcast on Sunday.

There are many plans to produce more programs in the future, said Steve Smethers, associate professor of journalism and mass communications.

"We want to get very good at producing these two programs," Smethers said.

"We have plans to do all sorts of things, but this is the first step."

It's a first step that Smethers said will help fill a void in Manhattan.

"This is going to give the university and the community much-needed TV news coverage," he said.

Smethers said Manhattan is one of the largest cities in the state that doesn't have a local station.

His hope, he said, is that these student-produced programs will provide an outlet for local news that is so often missed by larger, out-of-town stations.

"I watch Channel 13 and 27, and while I have a lot of respect for these news organizations, they can't afford to devote the time or effort to cover Manhattan," Smethers said.

"Having an additional news voice in Manhattan is a very good thing."

Landholm said she thinks it is necessary, as a school of journalism, to serve the community with electronic media.

"We felt we had, as faculty, the expertise to do this and now we have a medium," she said. "It is very exciting to see the state-of-the-art facilities and the students come together."

It is also a good thing for the university, Smethers said, because it gives students exposure to many aspects of broadcasting they haven't had before.

"This will allow us to build a really good news sequence here, and it will definitely strengthen our curriculum."

KHP class planned to better educate drivers

Completing class could decrease car insurance premiums

By Wendy Lynn
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Students, faculty and staff will soon have a chance to decrease their car insurance premiums and maybe even save lives in the process.

A one-day class, taught by the Kansas Highway Patrol, will teach participants about defensive driving and how to avoid fatal accidents. The class will focus on how to avoid common driving mistakes in everyday situations. It was developed by the National Safety Council.

"It has been estimated that over two-thirds of accidents are due to driver error, " Mitch Rickets, K-State safety officer, said.

"This class teaches how to be on the lookout and strategies to avoid accidents."

As an added benefit, students can receive discounts on their insurance premiums.

Each company has a different policy on the discounts, so class participants should check with their insurance company before enrolling in the class.

"Discounts will depend on your driving record," Rickets said.

"If you have had an accident or ticket, you will see the biggest decrease."

Defensive driving class

- When: 8 a.m. to 5 p.m., Feb. 19, March 11 and April 17.
- Cost: There is a $15 fee for the class and registration forms can be picked up at Lafene. Interested students should send the registration form and fee to 107 Lafene Health Center one week before class starts. Forty spots are open for each class.

A variety of topics will be covered in the class, including alcohol's effects on driving, proper use of seat belts and crosswalk accidents.

"I think it's a good idea," Abby Hollembeak, sophomore in life science, said.

"I would probably take it if it lowered my insurance."

Rickets said people from the age of 18 to early 20s are the most at risk for having a fatal vehicle accident and this class is designed to lower the risk of vehicle accidents.

"We have had a number of K-State students die in the last couple of years," he said.

"Since students are at such a high risk, we felt this was something that we needed to do."

Jay Reppert, medical director at Lafene Health Center, agreed with Rickets that motor vehicle accidents are a big cause for concern.

"Safe driving is a really important issue," Reppert said. "We still see many people who have been involved in accidents at Lafene."

OPINION

TO THE POINT

Time, evidence needed before military action

The reports are in. It's time for the Bush administration to show its cards or fold and admit it was bluffing to the world.

On Monday, top weapons inspector Hans Blix demanded Iraq disarm and accept U.N. resolutions during his report to the United Nations.

Other inspectors, along with many European nations, requested more time for the inspectors to complete their work.

The Bush administration seems ready for war no matter what the evidence shows.

Secretary of State Colin Powell said Saddam Hussein has "not much more time" to comply if he wants to avoid war.

British Foreign Secretary Jack Straw said Hussein was "making a charade of the inspection," and failure to comply would bring serious consequences.

But too many questions remain unanswered.

We've seen no smoking gun. The American public has not seen evidence that Iraq even possesses weapons of mass destruction.

Right now, all the world has to go on is the assurance of the American and British governments of wrongdoing by the Iraqi government. The reports say otherwise.

The time has come, and may be long past, to show proof. Vague assurances are no longer enough. It's unclear if our government has an ace up its sleeve – one that proves Hussein has lied to the world.

If Bush has the evidence, now is the time to reveal it.

If he doesn't – if the smoking gun is cold, or the assurances are misplaced – no lives should be put in jeopardy for the bravado of the West.

The inspectors should be given the time they need to come back with a complete and accurate report.

The American public, and the rest of the world, deserves proof before it ships its children off to occupy the Middle East, and before Iraqi citizens are made to suffer more than they already have.

FIREARM CONTROVERSY

Steps must be taken to ensure correct gun usage, education key to safety

MICAH HAWKINSON

Gun control.

Those simple words evoke a wide array of responses: outrage, fear, happiness and apathy, just to name a few.

Many people assert that guns are so intrinsically dangerous that we must outlaw them altogether to prevent people from getting hurt by firearms – both accidentally and on purpose.

Others say gun ownership is a fundamental, Constitutional right that we must preserve. If we compromise it in any way, they argue, our civil liberties will vanish without a trace.

Who's right? Is it more important to preserve individual freedom or to protect society from dangerous influences?

Most pro-gun arguments based on the Constitution are easily controvertible. The Second Amendment calls citizen-led militias "necessary to the security of a free State" and therefore justifies gun ownership.

In our society, however, we don't need citizen-led militias. The U.S. military is one of the most powerful in the world, which means we don't need private citizens to prevent attacks from outside the nation. Furthermore, our military is structured to prevent problems like military coups – that's one reason for our National Guard system.

Since we don't need gun-ownership rights for defense, the letter of the Second Amendment is outdated.

That said, we need to weigh the benefits of gun ownership against its detriments.

Guns can be very dangerous. They propel small, hard objects at high speeds, and these objects can cause severe trauma or death if they hit people in the right (or wrong) spot.

Because of their destructive capabilities, guns can make a murderer's job easier. Instead of having to club or knife their victims, murderers can use guns to do the job quickly and neatly. Since most of us probably agree that murder is immoral (or at least not very nice), this is a bad thing.

On the plus side, guns can be used for self-defense. If you want to keep a bad person from hurting you, a gun can do the trick. Of course, the sticky part is defining who is bad and who is good. But that's another issue.

Although they are dangerous, guns can be extremely entertaining. There's nothing quite like emptying a clip of ammo into a target at the end of a tough day at work or school.

Illustrations by Jeff Yeung | COLLEGIAN

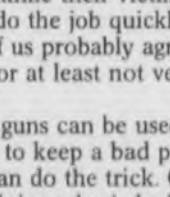
Guns are also good tools for hunting, which is a vital part of our modern ecology.

Here in Kansas, the best example is probably the deer population.

According to the Kansas Department of Wildlife and Parks, hunting deer in Kansas keeps the population from being culled by starvation and disease. Since there is a lack of natural predators, humans have to fill the gap in the food chain by killing and eating a lot of delicious deer.

Here's my answer to the gun control controversy: both extremes are wrong.

There certainly should be controls on guns, especially since we don't need an active civilian militia in the modern United States.



Nonetheless, guns can be useful if used properly. The trick is getting people to use them properly. And the best way to get people to use something properly is to instruct them about its capabilities and its proper use.

I propose intensive courses in firearm safety and vigorous background checks for all potential gun owners. The education would reduce accidental deaths, and the checks would hopefully keep most firearms out of the hands of dangerous people.

Guns, like all technology, are not bad in and of themselves. And, as with all technology, we can take steps to keep people from misusing them.

Law enforcement deserves respect from public

LINDSEY PRAECHTER

Pigs, po-pos, doughnut eaters – by any name, these women and men deserve much more respect.

Many people overlook the sacrifices that police officers make voluntarily for the good of each person in America.

Police officers' lives can be plagued with aggression and negativity. They see people at their worst. To see the world through the eyes of a police officer would be depressing at best.

Yet, even with all of the domestic violence, child abuse, burglaries and countless other crimes they witness every day, they still manage to devote their lives to helping others.

Law enforcement is a 24-7 job that involves risky behavior in uncertain situations, but officers dedicate, and sometimes give, their lives for society's well-being.

Becoming a police officer isn't easy.

At the Johnson County Community College police academy, a 560-hour curriculum must be completed to be certified as a Kansas law enforcement officer. This curriculum includes arrest procedures, communications skills, courtroom testimony, laws and procedures, and many other training courses to prepare an officer for certification according to their Web site, web.jccc.net.

Once these officers are certified, they are out on the street defending and protecting your community.

There are bad seeds in the law enforcement community, like the men that beat Rodney King. I cannot deny that law enforcement doesn't involve some authority, but it should be within the bounds of the law.

As citizens, we should be aware of our rights and cooperate as long as they are not being disregarded.

Anger erupts when suspects are shot and killed after posing a threat to an officer. What the public needs to understand is when officers shoot in defense, they shoot to kill. An officer's life or another's is being threatened enough that they have to use fatal force. A shot in the leg will not stop a perpetrator from shooting an officer in the head.

You have the power to understand and protect yourself by being knowledgeable of laws that many claim are taken advantage of by police officers.

A clear understanding of the right to search and seizure is primary, but often misunderstood.

The Fourth Amendment gives Americans the right "to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures." This cannot be violated unless there is probable cause– "supported by oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized," as the amendment outlines.

Probable cause, as defined by an online law dictionary, is "sufficient reason based upon known facts to believe a crime has been committed or that certain property is connected with a crime."

The laws that are the basis of our government are produced, in theory, to protect the citizens of the nation, whether it is from dangerous narcotics, powerful weapons or speeding.

Police officers risk their lives to uphold these laws and our democratic values, and deserve our respect and appreciation for it.

THE GOOD, THE BAD, THE UGLY

Poor table manners repel potential employers

By Rachel Krier
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Does the phrase 'were you raised in a barn?' mean anything to you? Probably, in the far recess of the mind, along with other cherished childhood memories, you can vaguely remember your mom reminding you to sit up straight and stop eating like a pig.

Your mother accusing you of having bad table manners may be easy to ignore, but when you evoke images of a cow chewing cud in front of your potential employee, maybe it's time to brush up on your table etiquette.

Talking with mouth full

If you think that you couldn't possibly be that person who has food flying out of their mouth at the dinner table, well think again.

Pat Pesci, director of hotel and restaurant management, said one of the most common displays of poor manners is also one of the most common and obvious taboos – talking with a mouth full of food.

"One of the biggest faux pas is talking with food in the mouth. Everyone does it," Pesci said. "A person knows the way to do things, but people practice it so infrequently."

Pesci, who considers bad table manners a national issue, attributes the rarity of proper dining etiquette to the on-the-go lifestyle of Americans.

"Fifty-two percent of restaurant service is drive-through," Pesci said. "People are not used to eating with others in a civilized setting."

Included with the civility of not talking with a full mouth is chewing with your mouth closed, making as little noise as possible and not picking your teeth in front of others, according to tips from the self-help Web site www.soyouwanna.com /site/syws/tablemanners.

Elbows on the table

Another very well-known but hardly practiced example of good manners is keeping your elbows off the table.

"We see a lot of people having their arms on the table while they eat their meal," Pesci said. "It's not your table. You have the chair and you talk to people at the table, but you don't own the table."

Putting your elbows on the table not only infringes on other people's space, it also projects the image that you are hovering over or leaning into your food, Pesci said.

"You should have good posture, and if your elbows are on the table then you're leaning over and not having good posture," Brittany Trupka, sophomore in Spanish, said.

Trupka serves as the personal development officer for Alpha Chi Omega sorority. She is responsible for sharing etiquette tips with her sorority sisters.

To improve your table manners, Trupka said to ask your friends to help point out when you are displaying bad manners.

"At first, it takes effort, but after a while, good manners come naturally," Trupka said. "In your professional life, having good manners will impress your boss, and if you don't, they will surely notice. Good manners will help you stand out among your peers."

Not a feeding frenzy

As for having good table manners at professional dinner meetings, Pesci stressed the importance of pacing.

"You need to have the idea that this is a dining meal, not an eating meal," Pesci said. "It's not necessarily about eating a lot of food. It's about talking to people."

The details of proper dining etiquette range from focusing on one bite at a time to not ordering more than one alcoholic drink. Pesci said that it is best to cut and eat one piece of food (steak, chicken, pie, bread, etc.) at a time.

"Don't cut four pieces at once and then have a force-feeding," Pesci said. "You need to realize that you might not finish your entire meal at a dinner meeting, and that is OK."

He also said that ordering more than one alcoholic drink during a dinner interview or meeting can sometimes be the kiss of death in the professional world. Lighting up a cigarette at the table can have the same negative affect, he said.

Napkins aren't decoration

Contrary to what one might think, everything at your place setting has a purpose.

"Put the napkin on your lap. At least that shows people that you know what it is for," Pesci said.

Not only does the napkin on the lap keep your pants protected from falling food or splatters, it also means other people at the table don't have to keep looking at the mess you just wiped from your face.

Using the knife to bring food to your mouth is another example of poor table manners. The knife is for cutting, and the fork is for bringing food to your mouth.

The fingers are reserved for a select list of foods, such as artichoke, non-slimey asparagus, crispy bacon, sandwiches, cookies, small fruit, french fries, corn on the cob, caviar and pickles, according to www.soyouwanna.com.

If all these details seem difficult to remember, especially during a stressful dinner interview, just stick to the basics, and remember, when in doubt, follow the host.

Musicians stage silent protest over government plan to license performers

Hundreds of jazz musicians, folk singers and traditional dancers wore gags as they protested outside Parliament Monday against new rules they say will silence live music in Britain's pubs.

The Licensing Bill, which Parliament is debating, will require bar owners to get a license for any form of live entertainment, or face a $32,000 fine or six months in jail.

Backstreet Boy tackles political issues

Backstreet Boy Kevin Richardson is all worked up about mining in the Appalachian mountains — an environmental travesty, in his new book.

In this era of boy band diversification — Nick Carter and Justin Timberlake have solo albums, Lance Bass is acting — Richardson has chosen a most unusual side career: political activist.

He was in Washington two years ago to lobby for more cancer-research funding. And last June, he testified before Congress about the ills of mountaintop removal — a type of mining in which the tops of mountains are displaced to extract coal.

Gramatica makes statement

Throughout the history of sports, there have been many great feuds. "ESPN The Magazine" complied a list of some of the most heated.

It included such battles as Mohammed Ali vs. Joe Frazier, Reggie Miller vs. Spike Lee, John Rocker vs. New York City, Art Modell vs. Cleveland, Pete Rose vs. Bud Selig, Roger Clemens vs. Mike Piazza, Al Davis vs. NFL, Larry Brown vs. Allen Iverson, Mark Cuban vs. NBA and Mike Tyson vs. Lennox Lewis.

CHRIS SHANK

They are all legitimate except for the last one, which was staged by Don King. But it was still fun to see Tyson trying to bite Lewis in a press-conference-turned-street-fight.

Each of these feuds have some similarities. All matched people against others who detested them. All included verbal threats and sports figures, while some even led to fisticuffs.

A more recent rivalry flared up this year between two unlikely adversaries. A punter Todd Sauerbrun and placekicker Martin Gramatica.

You might remember Sauerbrun from his one stellar season with the Chiefs in 2000. "Automatica Gramatica," of course, was the Lou Groza Award winner his junior year, as well as a two-time All-American with the Wildcats.

In 1998, Gramatica's senior year, he also hit a 65-yard field goal in the Northern Illinois game, the longest field goal without a tee in NCAA history. He then went on to be one of the highest-drafted kickers in NFL history.

But back to the feud.

It all started back on Oct. 27, when the Tampa Bay Buccaneers defeated the Carolina Panthers, 12-9 in Charlotte. Gramatica had four field goals for Tampa in the win, including a 47-yarder with 5 seconds left.

After the game winner, Gramatica showed his usual outpouring of emotion by jumping around.

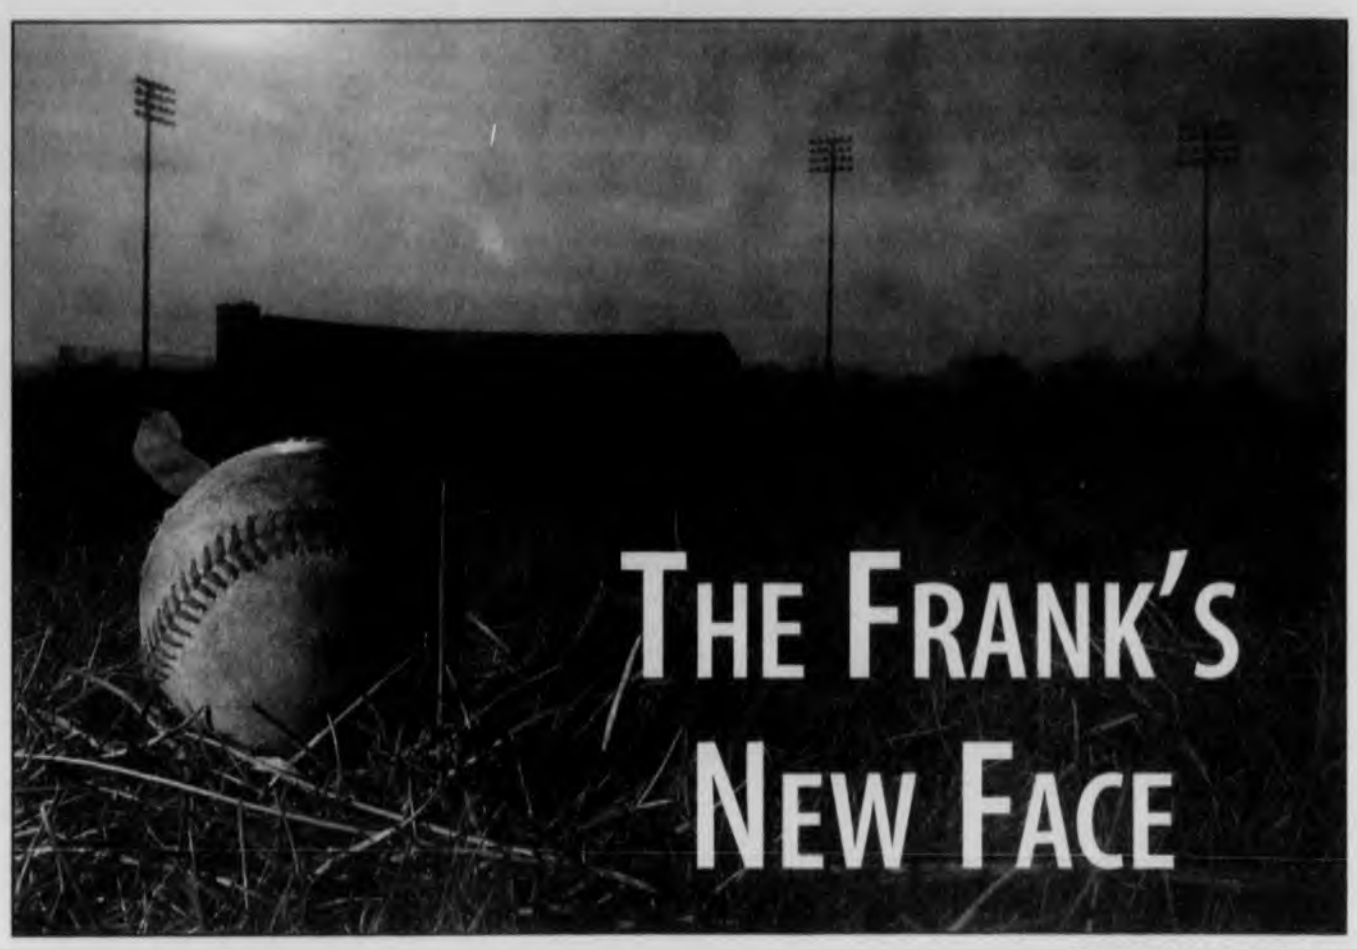
This "intimidating and taunting" gesture, performed by the 5-foot-8, 170-pound kicker was too much for Sauerbrun to endure.

If you think that's showboating, then you've never seen Terrell Owens or Randy Moss play.

Leading up to their rematch in Tampa, Sauerbrun threw down the gauntlet when he said, "He really needs to chill out, plain and simple. You don't see me jumping around when I hit a 70-yard punt like I've never done that before."

And the fight was on.

After Tampa Bay's 23-10 win over Carolina, Gramatica had to be restrained from clocking Sauerbrun on the field.



Even Martin's little brother had some words with Sauerbrun after the game.

But like any sore loser, Sauerbrun then bashed the entire Gramatica clan in the postgame press conference when he called the Gramatica brothers a bunch of idiots.

While Sauerbrun's Panthers went on to finish a sad 7-9, the Buccaneers won the NFC South. While Sauerbrun was busy trying to think of another insult to sling at Gramatica, Martin was helping kick the Buccaneers to a Super Bowl win. While Gramatica was scoring 13 points on Sunday, Sauerbrun was spending the postseason like KU's football team every year: at home.

The little K-Stater that kicked won a ring Sunday, and in doing so became only the third player from K-State to ever touch the Lombardi Trophy. He made us all happy and proud to call him a Wildcat. And he showed Todd Sauerbrun what a champion kicker is made of.

The 2003 season will usher in a new look at K-State's baseball facility. The installation of new lights will allow night games at Frank Myers Field at Tointon Family Stadium. The Wildcats will open their season on Feb. 15 against Western Illinois.

Stadium to lose past, gain future

By David Skretta
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

With progress invariably comes change.

Take the construction of Bramlage Coliseum, for example. When Bramlage opened in 1988, it came with mixed emotions. While many fans, players, and coaches welcomed the new facility, some lamented the loss of Ahearn Field House and its historic, intimate setting.

The same story can be told of the replacement of a landmark in college baseball. This spring will mark the addition of a $65,000 electronic scoreboard, along with permanent lighting, that will complete a series of renovations to Frank Myers Field at Tointon Family Stadium.

Reportedly the oldest manual scoreboard in continual use in Division I baseball, according to K-State Sports Information, the scoreboard acted as a pivotal link to the glory days of baseball as "America's pastime."

The fact that K-State will be replacing a piece of history is not lost on Coach Mike Clark. But the 17th-year coach also realizes the drawbacks of keeping the manual scoreboard operational.

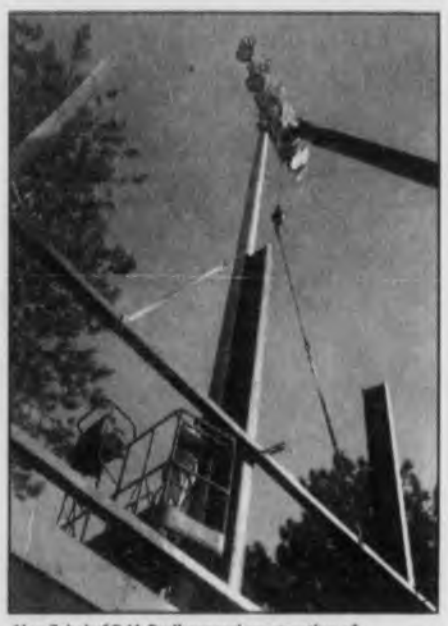
"A lot of people have expressed their disappointment in replacing the old scoreboard, but when the fans see the new scoreboard and everything we can do with it, we think they'll forget about the wind blowing from the west and knocking out our scoring system," Clark said.

"The old scoreboard basically has outgrown its livelihood. We had to spend a lot of time and money to operate it, and cost-wise, it didn't make much sense."

The manual scoreboard has seen plenty of glory, however. Since The Frank opened in 1961, the scoreboard has posted 546 Wildcat victories, including 14 consecutive wins during a 1981-82 season that saw K-State go 30-6 at home.

Disassembled in pieces, the future of the old scoreboard remains in doubt. One possibility is to auction it off at the athletic department's annual fundraiser.

"It was certainly unique," said associate athletic director Casey Scott. "But it also had inherent problems. From expenses to poor communication with the operators, it wasn't what we wanted from a game-management standpoint.



"We'll be able to operate the new scoreboard from the press box. It's going to have a large message center so we can have updated stats, player names, sponsor messages, and things that will help provide good information for the fans.

"We thought the new scoreboard would be something that will greatly enhance our facility and program."

One improvement that nobody is expressing qualms about is the addition of permanent lighting to Myers Field.

"We're extremely pleased with the lighting," Scott said. "It's going to be a great addition to the stadium, not only from a playability standpoint, but also an academic standpoint.

"Playing so many day games at home during the week was tough on our guys. Some had to get out of class early while some had to miss classes entirely. This will help us to avoid those problems."

Alan Zabel of R.M. Baril general construction of Manhattan, welds a portion of the frame Monday that will hold the new scoreboard at Frank Myers Field at Tointon Family Stadium. The electronic scoreboard will replace the old manual board that made up the wall in right field. The new scoring system will be in place before the Wildcats' first home baseball game on Feb. 15.

Clark noted that stadium improvements help everyone involved with K-State athletics.

"We're very excited about the projects. Any improvements done help our program by drawing fans, to win recruiting battles, and by simply creating a great atmosphere for players and fans alike."

"The lights are up and active," Scott said. "The scoreboard is going up as we speak. We anticipate everything to be ready for our first game on Feb. 15."

Male practice squad sharpens women's edge

By Ben Fehr
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

They've been called incredible.

They've been called invaluable.

They're the men the K-State women's basketball team practices against.

K-State, like many women's teams around the country, practices against men to help prepare for the capabilities of the nation's top female athletes.

And if this season's 18-1 record is any indication, K-State's practice men are doing pretty well.

Colby Taylor, senior in pre-professional elementary education, said there are a number of benefits that go along with working out with the women's team.

"They want at least five guys here every day," he said. "It's about three hours a day, so it's not real time consuming and it's fun. It keeps you in shape, and the coaches are awesome.

"It's just something to be involved in and be a part of while you're at college."

Three hours a day may not seem like much time, but the men's main job – learning and running the plays of the Wildcats' opponents – can be a time-consuming affair.

Taylor also said anyone who plans on playing against K-State, especially center Brie Madden, had better be ready to go home with a few bumps and bruises when their time is up.

"All of them have a tendency to get a little physical," he said. "Every now and then you'll have a shot in the lower region that, for us, is kind of funny, because as long as it's not you, you always get a kick out of it.

"But Brie really does have sharp elbows and she's well known for throwing them."

Back to basics for Cat men

There just might be a friendly note to the schedule-makers this week, courtesy of Coach Jim Wooldridge.

That's because K-State will enjoy its first, and only, open week of the season – a date that comes at the perfect time, associate head coach Mike Miller said on Monday's Big 12 teleconference.

"We have to use this week to get ourselves ready," Miller said. "We really have to get back to the basics this break, so to speak.

"Not having a mid-week game has really come at a good time for us to regroup a little bit and work on some things that will help us improve as a team."

The Wildcats endured a tough 79-66 loss to Texas A&M on Saturday in College Station, Texas, one that saw the team shoot just 41.7 percent from the foul line.

It's those kinds of little things K-State will look to perfect before entertaining No. 6 Oklahoma on Saturday.

Marty Mornhinweg was fired as coach of the Detroit Lions on Monday after a 3-13 season, the second-worst record in the league.

Detroit was 5-27 under Mornhinweg over the last two seasons, including a road record of 0-16. The Lions lost their last eight games this season, and only Cincinnati finished with a worse record.

Lions chief executive Matt Millen, with the blessing of team owner William Clay Ford Sr., said on Dec. 31 that Mornhinweg would return as coach.

On Monday, Millen said Mornhinweg's firing was part of the team's process of moving forward.

IRAQ | Powell warns time is running out

Mohamed ElBaradei, who heads the U.N. nuclear control agency, said nuclear inspections of 106 sites had turned up no evidence so far that Iraq was reviving its nuclear program. With Iraq's cooperation, he said, "we should be able, within the next few months, to provide credible assurance that Iraq has no nuclear weapons programs."

"These few months would be a valuable investment in peace because it could help avoid a war," ElBaradei told the council.

While ElBaradei asked for more time to carry out inspections, Blix made no request to continue working in his 15-page report, delivered at an open council meeting.

But Blix's spokesman, Ewen Buchanan, said there were no differences with ElBaradei and that Blix has mapped out a program of future inspections, which he referred to in the report. "This is an update of an ongoing and continuing process of inspections. It is not the end of the road," Buchanan said.

In closed-door consultations after the reports, U.S. Ambassador John Negroponte pointedly asked Blix and ElBaradei how much time they needed to conclusively determine whether Iraq was complying with its obligations, diplomats told The Associated Press on condition of anonymity.

Blix is planning to present a list of Iraq's "key remaining disarmament tasks" in late March, as called for in a December 1999 resolution, unless told otherwise, Buchanan said.

Kueck said the young scouts are not the only people who benefit when college students become troop leaders.

"We are involved in the community and get to have fun at the same time," she said. "Girl Scouts has also helped develop and hone my leadership skills."

Be a leader

■ Those interested in becoming a troop leader or volunteering time with the Girl Scouts of Kaw Valley can call the main office at (785) 273-3100.

Rush encourages anyone who wants to become a scout leader to become involved with the organization.

"Leaders get to interact with girls, they get the opportunity to do community service and volunteerism which may be required for classes," she said. "Ex-scouts do have a background in the organization, but anyone can get the network of connections."

Kueck said that although being a scout leader does not involve a great deal of time, it does require a certain level of commitment.

"It doesn't take a lot of time, but there is a big commitment because you have to stick with it – you can't quit in the middle of the year," she said. "You need to stay dedicated to it."

but has bought their property when owners move, or when an establishment goes under.

Another new addition to Aggieville is the Purple Pig, which was previously on Houston Street, near the Manhattan Town Center.

Owner Keith Eyestone said when his lease for the property on Houston Street wasn't renewed, he bought the old Scoreboard location from Olson, who owned it and 12th Street Pub.

Eyestone said the Purple Pig is now a drinking establishment instead of a beer tavern. He will sell liquor, wine and beer.

The Purple Pig will stay open seven days a week until 2 a.m. instead of closing at midnight and staying open only six days a week.

Eyestone said his bar, too, will be stocked with sports memorabilia along with K-State pictures and posters.

"I really want to stand out as being a K-State sports bar that caters to college kids, alumni and townspeople who follow K-State," he said.

Eyestone said he's excited to be in Aggieville because of the increased pedestrian and drive-by traffic he will encounter.

Allison Marten, junior in political science, has been working at the Purple Pig since it opened.

She said she'd encourage people to come to the bar because of its atmosphere.

"We're the only K-State sports bar in Aggieville," she said. "It's a good atmosphere for anyone who wants to watch sports on TV, we've got lots of them."

Eyestone said customers can expect the kitchen at the Purple Pig to be open in 30 days.

BASICS | Men to use week off for improvement

Wednesday-Saturday routine, you're pretty much in a game routine," Miller said. "Sometimes when you get into that, you get into preparation and looking at the other team.

"But what we have in this open week, we can really go back to our stuff and really look at how we are defending, playing offense, and we can spend two or three days just working on our stuff. It's just helpful to be able to get back to that, to the type of practices we had at the beginning of the year."

The storyline for K-State this season has already had its fair share of ebbs and flows.

Early in the season, it was the eight-game winning streak the Wildcats sustained, a streak that included a win over ranked Texas Tech.

K-State then lost conference contests to Colorado and Kansas before smoking Nebraska last week at home.

The Wildcats stand with an 11-7 overall record and a 2-3 mark in conference, good for eighth place in the Big 12.

Miller said he is pleased with the way the newcomers have quickly adjusted to Division-I basketball.

Junior Tim Ellis is third in scoring at nearly 11 a game, while junior Frank Richards isn't far behind at 9.8 per contest.

However, Miller said he was especially impressed with the play of freshman Marques Hayden.

"He's a guy you want," he said. "He goes out excited every day to compete against some of the great teams in the country.

"He's adapted to college basketball very well, and we believe he will be a valuable asset to this team."

Hayden has provided some much-needed depth for the Cats off the bench, Miller said, as he and others have been asked to give more after the departure of senior Janerio Spurlock and sophomore Marcelo Da Barrosa.

But Miller said that shouldn't hurt the Wildcats down the stretch. It's about who wants to be there that matters, he said.

"We feel good about the group we have here," Miller said.

"These guys are really working hard and are committed to Kansas State. That's what's important.

"We have 11 guys here who are working and we think we have enough to accomplish what we want to do."

against their women on a day-to-day basis.

Brandon Wehling, junior in open option and cousin of sophomore forward Kendra Wecker, was a member of the practice squad for a full season before Kendra's freshman campaign in 2001-02.

He said coming to practice ready to compete is a necessity.

"They try to run us over every day," Wheling said. "They come out and practice like they want to play in their games. They come out hard every day, don't slack off, and they don't take it easy on us."

Wehling said he must also be on the lookout for Wecker.

"Kendra likes to cheap shot me every once in a while just because she can," he said. "She does screens in the back, elbows, and a knee in the leg every once in awhile, you know, just to let me know she's there."

K-State assistant Sue Serafini said the men are certainly an asset the women have come to respect.

"They're the most invaluable part of what we do," Serafini said. "These guys come together every single day, at whatever time we call them, to run against our players.

"They truly do make us better. There's no question that they have speed, athleticism, and heart that they bring to the floor. They're very competitive."

Serafini said the men's practice squad is part of what has made K-State such a tough team to beat.

"They run through the wall for us and the girls, and we couldn't ask for much more from them," she said.

"They are great guys who are really committed to not only making us better as a program, but also to making each player better individually. Their dedication and commitment to our program is incredible."

Iraq criticizes report

Baghdad vows to improve on recent problems

By Charles J. Hanley
THE ASSOCIATE PRESS

BAGHDAD, Iraq – Arms inspectors exaggerated problems over progress in their pivotal reports to the U.N. Security Council, a senior Iraqi complained Tuesday. He said Baghdad would work on the problems, including scientists' rejection of private U.N. interviews.

On another issue – U.N. reconnaissance overflights – Lt. Gen. Amir Rashid said Iraq would allow them if the Security Council told Washington to ground its attack planes during such missions.

Diplomats said this was not a serious concession. With the United States and Britain, who are conducting the flights, both having veto power in the council, approval was highly unlikely.

At the Pentagon, spokesman Bryan Whitman said "It's a matter for the United Nations to discuss." He said the United States intends to continue flying combat air patrols over Iraq to enforce the southern and northern "no fly" zones.

In Iraq's first detailed response to Monday's reports by chief inspectors Hans Blix and Mohamed ElBaradei, Rashid, a presidential adviser, said his government was cooperating with inspectors "with all our capacity" to show that Iraq has no weapons of mass destruction. He said it would do more as required.

The Blix-ElBaradei assessment set the stage for renewed debate among world governments about what to do in Iraq – allow U.N. inspections to go on, or short-circuit what Blix calls "the peaceful route" and opt for war against Iraq, as threatened by Washington and London.

In the text of his State of the Union address Tuesday night, President Bush said Saddam Hussein has shown "utter contempt" for the world community and must be held to account. On Wednesday, the Security Council meets in New York with Blix and ElBaradei to discuss questions raised by council members about their reports.

In his report Monday, Blix said the Iraqis were cooperating by granting full access for inspectors, but said they'd failed to offer evidence to allay suspicions they retain chemical, biological or nuclear weapons programs. They seem not to have come to "genuine acceptance" of U.N. disarmament demands, he said.

In his meeting with reporters late Tuesday, Rashid objected to such judgments.

State of Union sparks interest among students

By Crystal Becker
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Students watched President Bush's State of the Union address among treadmills and stairclimbers in the crowded Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex late Tuesday. Although many came simply to exercise, some students were eager hear what the president had to say to the nation.

Like Haley Anthony, for instance.

"I've been waiting since about 8:30 this morning – waiting for anything," said Anthony, freshman in criminology and U.S. Army reservist. "There's such a big possibility of going overseas right now."

Anthony said reservists would be deployed before the active army if war were to develop in the Middle East.

"For the past couple of months I've been waiting. I just want to know," she said. "It would just determine what path I take."

Lt. Dave Marone, a K-State graduate who is based out of Fort Riley, was on a path to deployment almost three weeks ago.

"As of three weeks ago, I was supposed to be deployed next week, but there was a last minute change," Marone said. "I was getting geared up and ready to go."

Marone said he agrees with President Bush's stance on war, but it isn't something he dwells on.

"Ideally, war would never have to

Bush: U.S. vows to disarm Iraq if necessary

By Ron Fournier
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON (AP) – Building a case for war against Iraq, President Bush said Tuesday night he has fresh evidence that Saddam Hussein seeks to "dominate, intimidate or attack" with weapons of mass destruction that he could share with terrorist allies. Bush pledged to "fight with the full force and might of the United States military," if necessary, to disarm Iraq.

"A future lived at the mercy of terrible threats is no peace at all," the president said in a State of the Union address that also put forward tax cuts, Medicare changes and other domestic policies geared toward his 2004 re-election drive.

George W. Bush
PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

For the first time since the Sept. 11 attacks transformed him into a wartime president, Bush faced the nation amid serious questions about his leadership. Most Americans don't approve of his handling of the economy, polls indicate, and only a bare majority support his policies on Iraq – an area where the president enjoyed support of more than 80 percent a year ago.

The first half of Bush's hour-long address was devoted to domestic policy, a reflection of his desire not to let Iraq overshadow domestic issues dear to Americans. The heart of his package is a $674 billion plan to revive the economy, mostly with tax cuts, and a $400 billion, 10-year proposal to overhaul Medicare, sprinkled with initiatives to combat AIDS, produce energy-efficient cars and give religious groups access to federal community service money.

After an address interrupted 77 times by applause, Democrats challenged Bush's efforts both at home and abroad.

"Tonight, the president

Playboy recruitment, salary compensations discussed at Women's Forum

Imagine a close girlfriend came to you distraught after having been a victim of violence. What could you do for her? How could you make a difference and prevent this from happening to other women on campus?

These and other gender-based topics were discussed during the Women's Forum on Tuesday in the Union Big 12 Room.

Janice Dinkel, associate professor of social anthropology and social work, began the meeting with an opportunity for students to voice concerns.

Beth Engel, senior in psychology, had something to say about the campus' attitude toward women.

"As long as we allow things like Playboy recruiters and the calendars for the Greek Affairs to go on around campus, male faculty as well as students are not going to take women, even instructors, seriously," Engel said.

"That was my one regret coming here to K-State. I was really disgusted by my professors and the guys around me looking in the Collegian at things like that and looking back at me. There's no call for allowing that on campus."

Along with issues of child care, dual career hires and salary comparisons, the meeting dealt with topics such as maternity leave, women's sports and scholarship money, the lack of required harassment and violence orientation, and minority women's issues.

BANTER AND BELLOW

Hair length, style too often the basis for ridiculous, inaccurate gender stereotypes

Question

What are your complaints about hair stereotypes?

You can e-mail Banter and Bellow columnists Dana Strongin, junior in print journalism, and Layton Ehmke, senior in print journalism, at banter@spub.ksu.edu.

LAYTON:

Hair: Limitless

Here's what I have to say about hair: the more the merrier.

People without access to long hair are straight-up missing out. There's simply more to do with long hair.

You might say that I have a bit of an emotional connection with my big-damn hair, and you would be right. There are a lot of reasons I grew out my hair, but don't ask me why because I'll just ask why you have your hair the way you do. The truth is that hair adds character, and it's functional, too.

Check this out: if I get stranded on an island where there is no civilization, I can make rope out of my hair, or maybe a net for catching fish. Hell, if I were MacGyver, making a trombone out of my hair wouldn't even sound impossible.

What's really funny about having shoulder-length hair is how people always want to come up and touch it. Hey, if you're not a guy, then be my guest. I could use a scalp massage, too, so go ahead and dig in. If you happen to find my other set of keys in there, it would do you good to let me know.

Long hair also adds a texture to your personality. It allows for personal freedom, because freedom is not giving a flying 'f' bomb about what people think. Of course, if your style is complete baldness, don't half-ass it. Shave it all off, but keep your clippers away from me.

Finally, it has been proven that men who yell "hippie" at men with long hair are severely sexually frustrated. I wish to extend best wishes and a warm middle finger in the general direction of those men.

DANA:

Hair: It's just dead protein

It can be flipped, feathered or highlighted, and back in the day it featured the two-prong nested bang of the early '90s.

It's hair, and people put too much into its meaning.

I'll take you back to the days of my youth. My parents thought it would be cool to have my thick red waves chopped off.

It wasn't cool at all. Despite the cutesy pink and yellow barrettes I liked to wear, the other kids still asked, "Are you a boy?" Oh, the shame.

Interestingly enough, I revisited short locks in eighth grade, and until recently, have sported hair that was sometimes so short I could only spike it.

In high school, this was a risky move. I remember my high school classmates speculating about my sexual orientation. But within a couple of years, other gals followed suit. They wanted to be daring like my bad self.

When you think about it, the whole charade of my lock length is ridiculous.

Hair is not a mystical window into its wearer's soul. Hair makes a statement, but it's no loose-lipped ship. It's a combination of style, genetics, time and sometimes luck.

Given these factors, and the fact that hair is dead protein, personal investigations should start elsewhere. What's your last name, and do you like Mexican food?

And no, banterer Layton is not a bonafide hippie. He just has great hair that deserves to be long.

Don't even think about asking about redheads. If we do possess a special mojo, it's our secret and the secret of those who know us best.

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Whether K-State students aspire to the intelligence of Albert Einstein or the charisma of Brad Pitt, there is something on the calendar for them.

A college bowl competition and a Valentine's Day game show version of "Singled Out" are two upcoming events sponsored by the Union Program Council.

Today is the deadline to sign up a team for Saturday's college bowl competition.

As of Tuesday morning, only five teams had signed up, said Ashley Friesen, UPC special events committee chair and junior in English and secondary education. She said she's not worried, however, and she expects about 16 teams.

"Everybody signs up at the very last minute," she said.

The competition is a question-and-answer game played between two teams of four players each, according to the UPC Web site.

"It's a tradition, so we kind of just carry it on every year," Friesen said.

The winning team will be awarded $100, with $75 going to second place and $50 to third.

In addition, the winning team will get to compete at the regional tournament in Lawrence on Feb. 21-23.

Hotel arrangements and all other expenses for the team representing K-State at Lawrence will be paid for by the university, Friesen said.

Saturday's competition will be in Bluemont 108. Check-in starts at 8:30 a.m., and the tournament starts at 9:30. Each round is scheduled for 30 minutes.

For students who would rather show off their charm rather than their knowledge, the UPC also is sponsoring a game show version of "Singled Out" on Valentine's Day.

The game show is part of UPC's Friday night After Hours activities.

"Because After Hours fell on Valentine's day, I wanted to do something that targeted singles as opposed to couples," said Samantha Musil, After Hours event coordinator and graduate student in public administration.

"Usually, on Valentine's Day, everybody targets the couples, so I decided to do something for those single folks."

The UPC is searching for one male and one female contestant who everyone else competes for the date with, Musil said.

"I don't want people to get confused that they have to apply to be part of the game, because if they just want to show up that night and be part of the masses that compete for the date, they can."

Applications will be accepted until 5 p.m. Feb. 4, and selected applicants will be called in for an interview.

Musil said she is looking for "an all-around K-State student."

The winning couples will be picked up by a limo and treated to a chaperoned, all-expense paid date including dinner, a show or movie, and bowling or pool.

Applications for the college bowl and "Singled Out" can be picked up at the UPC office on the third floor of the K-State Student Union. Anyone interested in these events can get more information by calling the UPC office at 532-6571 or visiting its Web site at www.ksu.edu/upc.

Faculty: students forgetting Kansas history

Survey shows U.S. students rate low for retaining geographic information

By Rogie Dorpinghaus
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Paul Mannion has noticed a trend of students in his classes.

He's recognized that high school and college students don't know basic facts about where they live.

"It's not just a Kansas thing," said Mannion, a graduate teaching assistant in geography. "It's relevant everywhere.

"I believe that foreign students know more about our country than Americans do."

In the Manhattan-Ogden USD 383, students learn Kansas history at the elementary and junior high school levels.

James Sherow, associate professor in history, has children in the school district and said he believes information is taught to students at too early an age.

As a result, he said, the information doesn't stick in their heads.

Karen Roberts, director of curriculum for the USD 383 Board of Education, said the state history course was moved from ninth grade to eighth grade because of state standards.

"We integrated Kansas history at the 11th grade level but do not focus on it because of our alignment," she said.

Furthermore, Roberts said that the age of the student is not a factor in recalling information.

"I think Kansas history taught in eighth grade should be able to be recalled later in a student's education," she said.

"The best practice would tell us that any connections we can make with prior learning are going to enhance students' memories of Kansas history.

"That should possibly be one of our goals at the high school level- to integrate Kansas history into other courses."

Mannion said he thinks the reason some students have trouble recalling basic information about the state is because they just don't care.

Sherow said he believes students don't know what they're missing in the state of Kansas.

"A great many have not explored the state and don't know what's there," Sherow said.

"The state is rich in history, but you can't understand where you live or how things occurred unless you understand some of the basic facts."

In addition, the problem of retaining basic history and geography facts extend far from the state.

In November 2002, U.S. citizens came in next to last place in The National Geographic-Roper 2002 Global Geographic Literacy Survey according to www.nationalgeographic.com.

The survey polled more than 3,000 18 to 24-year-olds in Canada, France, Germany, Great Britain, Italy, Japan, Mexico, Sweden and the United States.

Sweden scored the highest and Mexico scored the lowest.

According to the survey, about 11 percent of U.S. citizens couldn't even locate the U.S. on a map.

"A lot of students don't have a keen sense of where they are," Sherow said.

TO THE POINT

State history education needs to occur early

It's time for Kansas educators to realize that Kansas history is not penetrating the minds of students statewide.

Recalling the sunflower as the state's flower and the Ornate Box Turtle as the state reptile doesn't necessarily constitute as a keen knowledge of the 142-year-old state. Curriculum needs to be evaluated and perhaps updated to better make the content more meaningful.

To the point is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

Kansas education leaders should not take lightly surveys that show the lack of knowledge students have about the state. Currently, the state focuses on Kansas history for one year in high school. This simply isn't effective for retention if only one year out of 12 is being spent on 142 years of history.

Students should be exposed to more in-depth, activity-based instruction on Kansas at earlier ages.

With a firm background on the history, later curriculum can simply be reinforcement material for early classroom instruction.

CAMPUS FOURUM

395-4444

Did anyone else get the feeling that after reading Hawkinson's column that it was an insult to human intelligence?

Is it sad that I love my roommate's girlfriend more than he does?

I'll be your midget.

Subtitles during sex are the best thing ever.

Where's my "Joe Millionare." This sucks, Cox.

Yeah, um, my roommate and I were wondering if the Dillons twins would like to marry us. Thank you.

Yes, this is to the person who was watching porn and doing their homework on Saturday night. My friends and I were doing the exact same thing. I think we should form a club or something.

I found Bugs Bunny kind of attractive when he put on a girl's dress.

I was so poor Sunday that I made bean burritos out of bean dip.

Nothing like a nice refreshing porn after a workout.

Is it just me, or does anyone else hear their cell phone ring when you listen to music?

Um, yeah, do you think there's any way that the university could afford some decent smelling soap for the restrooms?

It pisses me off to hear anybody sing "God Bless America." I'm ashamed to walk down the street and call myself an American.

JELL-O GIRLFRIEND

Jealous girlfriend worth constantly working to please

Paul Restivo

My girlfriend is a Jell-O girlfriend.

Well, at least, this is what AskMen.com tells me. The cutie-patootie that I have come to love suffers from an extreme case of jealousy. A Jell-O woman looks good, is tasty, and seems like fun to play with. But unfortunately, my girlfriend of almost six years uses Jell-O to build her ego's foundation. Here are the 10 warning signs that prove this.

1. Calls me up every two hours just to say, "I love you." (a premise to check up on me).

This is usually followed by an argument on why I "never say it first."

2. Refuses to accept that I have female friends.

If I have them, I'm sleeping with them – unless they're fat.

3. Asking about my night with the boys turns into an all-night interrogation.

"Did you drink? You're not supposed to drink. You get sick." I am sure not to bring up the weekend before when she got so blitzed that she became obsessed with touching the privates of other women.

4. Refuses to let me leave the house without her there to accompany me.

Wanting to leave without her shows my supposed deep desire to drive around, honking at big-busted babes and then pulling over to find the next available candidate for road-head.

5. Slaps me every time I come within 50 feet of another attractive woman.

"You're such a (insert shorter name for Richard)" always accompanies this.

6. Blows up at me and begins to convulse at any mention of a female celebrity.

My girlfriend is aware with my awkward obsession with Shania Twain. I refer you to Super Bowl halftime. After Shania's performance on TV, which I watched with binoculars, pumpkiny wumpkiny calls up to make sure I was aware that Shania looked like a hooker and that her boobs jiggled way too much. Kind of like Jell-O.

7. Every time I return home from a night out with the boys, asks me to drop my pants in order to smell my penis.

This one is just disgusting. But funny.

8. Is jealous of my family and asks questions like, "Why were you talking to your mother for so long?"

She speaks of all my mother's faults, but fails to realize that she is just like her. I try to remind her that guys tend to date women that share characteristics of their mother. But this usually leads to a Freudian incestuous argument and how I'm "such a (insert shorter name for Richard)."

9. I have stop-looking-at-other-women bruises all over my body.

Yeah, she beats me.

10. I'm afraid. I'm very afraid.

Any guy who says he is not afraid of his girlfriend is a damn liar.

With the exception of number 7, my sticky buns contains all of these qualities. But I'm not worried. I would still choose her over any other woman in the world. Except for Shania and her jiggly boobs, of course.

Finding love can be easy once one knows how to navigate through the singles scene

Kathryn Hollingsworth

"Hey you like tomatoes? Me too. Want to go out Friday night?"

Hoping to meet your soul mate in the produce section may sound farfetched, but you never know.

If you boldly wore green yesterday to display your freedom, you know the joys and pitfalls of singlehood. Being unattached can be lonely and disheartening – especially when Feb. 14 rolls around.

But moping about your single predicament wastes time and energy.

You're young, you're free, and you're surrounded by thousands of single people. Can it get any better?

For the exciting world of the single life in Manhattan, here are a few suggestions to ease the journey from singlehood to couple bliss.

1. Greek, non-greek, alien — whatever

Deciding to date only greeks or holding on to a preconceived notion about fraternity boys or sorority girls is only going to limit your dating potential.

It is time to shed any prejudices or stereotypes you may direct toward a particular group and broaden your horizons.

Getting stuck in a dating rut is easy to do, but when you stray from your general type, good things can happen.

Finding someone who is a polar opposite from you can spice up your life and open new doors. Stepping out of your comfort zone and trying new things typically make you a much cooler person.

2. Date casually

Don't start planning your wedding and naming children after a first date. Putting too much stock in one person generally drives them away. When an individual recognizes what a happening person you are, and that you are sought after, their interest will peak.

Just for fun, see how many people you can date at the same time. As long as you're honest with potential honeys, enjoy the game. Nothing is better than having a calendar full of events.

3. Never, ever date roommates, co-workers, twins

It's tempting, but it's asking for trouble. It is not enjoyable to work every day with a bitter ex, or get a chance to see your ex-boyfriend when visiting your current one.

Dating is fun, but it's difficult – and when you stir a little jealousy and controversy into the mix, it can quickly turn into a train wreck. Someone is bound to get hurt – and that's no fun.

4. Location, location, location

Parties are a great way to meet a lot of people. But be prepared to find that prospective boyfriend/girlfriend wherever you go.

Classes are good because you have interests in the same things. If you're religious, network at church. Flirting with waitresses/waiters and clerks may also lead to a potential date.

The sky is the limit.

Being outgoing and friendly everywhere will attract people to you.

5. Show off your personality

Come up with some great pick-up lines when approaching a hottie. Here are a few to get you started: "Hey sweet thang. Can I buy you a fish sandwich? Damn – if being sexy was a crime, you'd be guilty as charged. You're cooler than the other side of the pillow. If I could rearrange the alphabet, I would put U and I together."

Having great pickup lines that show off your sense of humor and playful personality are a must.

Using pick-up lines, if done artfully, can really work for you.

We're young, we're single – rock on.

The rest of our lives stretch on to be tied down.

Our single days are the crazy times we'll laugh about forever. So get your hair done, buy a new outfit and prepare to take Manhattan by storm.

Then, while having the time of your life, you may just find the love of your life.

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

Editor,

While a K-State student, I was often baffled by the shallowness and lack of insight displayed by the Collegian Editorial Board in its daily editorials. What little credibility the Board still had in my mind vanished with its ignorant "head in the sand" piece published on Tuesday.

The Board claims the United States has shown no evidence justifying a war with Iraq. Ironically, on the same day that their editorial was published, the online Collegian included a letter from Robert R. Eberle, Ph.D. outlining more than enough proof to justify military enforcement.

Any un-enforced resolution is worthless, but even after 16 resolution violations and evidence that he has slaughtered his own people, President Bush agreed to give Hussein one more chance to choose peace by disarming, or war by disobeying.

Unfortunately, Hussein has chosen war. I encourage everyone to read Eberle's letter in Tuesday's eCollegian if they still do not understand why.

Advisers stress deadlines for scheduling changes

By Abbie Whited
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The spring semester is in its third week, and many students still need to change their schedules. So what do they do?

Visit Willard 210.

"Students come in here to drop or add if they don't use KATS," Sharon Hauck, manager of enrollment services, said.

In Willard, students must pick up drop/add forms and fill them out to change schedules.

"Some colleges require an adviser's signature to drop," said Hauck, who has been employed by K-State for more than 30 years.

"After five days into the semester, you have to have the instructor's permission to add. That's a university rule, and many students don't know that," she said.

Instructors can give permission to add a course either electronically through KATS or by signing a course section permit form.

Cole Hawver knows that.

"I think it's pretty cumbersome with having to get adviser and instructor signatures," Hawver, junior in history, said. He was in Willard on Monday switching classes.

Adviser signatures are not required by all colleges. But the colleges of Agriculture, Architecture, Planning and Design, Education, Engineering, and Human Ecology do require signatures for students to drop or add classes.

Ray Hightower, assistant dean of student services for the College of Engineering, said the requirement of adviser signatures is a good thing for students. He said that checking with an adviser before making schedule changes can "optimize time for degree completion."

Students aren't always aware of course prerequisites, and an adviser can make sure all requirements are met, he said.

"Advisers are responsible for the academic progress of students. They help students stay on track academically," said Hightower, who maintains a Listserv for engineering students and advisers to update them on academic policies and procedures.

"Students don't always remember or know that some family insurance plans require enrollment in at least 12 hours. Advisers will protect students so they don't drop below that number," Hightower said.

Hightower said advisers also can ensure that students are not enrolled in too many courses.

"Students who don't use advisers tend to have academic difficulty. I find that those students earn D or F grades 85 percent of the time because they are working too many hours at a part-time job and are attempting to take too many academic hours," he said. "It's a two-way street. Something has to give. You have to either take fewer courses or work fewer hours at a job."

Assistant Registrar Gunile DeVault offered some suggestions to students who may need to drop or add courses after the semester's begun.

"The sooner they can get settled, the better off they are academically. But things can happen, and students need to change their schedules," DeVault said. "Go back to the adviser who will work with your schedule. Or go back to the college. People are willing to help you with your schedule.

"We don't want them to lose money either. Within the first three weeks of the semester, students can get a 100 percent refund."

After that, the refund amount decreases.

To ease the process, Hauck advises students to "just have their forms completed when they come into the office. Have the required signatures on there."

Sharon wins crushing victory over Labor in Israel's election

By Dan Perry
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

JERUSALEM – Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, who has taken a hard line against the Palestinian uprising, won a crushing victory in Israel's election Tuesday, and TV projections showed his Likud and other hawkish parties easily winning most seats in parliament.

The prospect of progress on the Palestinian front now appears to depend on whether Sharon can form a coalition that will include the opposition Labor party, which campaigned on a pledge to restart peace negotiations with the Palestinians.

In his victory speech before jubilant supporters, Sharon called for a "unity government" and warned that "there is no cause for celebration. The battle against the terrorist organizations hasn't ended and it claims more victims every day... It's a time for soul-searching, for uniting."

Israel TV quoted Sharon as saying he would not establish a right-wing government under any circumstances, although in his speech he did not offer any policy incentive to Labor.

Amram Mitzna, who led Labor to its worst defeat in history, has ruled out joining a Likud-led government, and he reiterated that stance Tuesday after congratulating Sharon on his victory. "We will remind Sharon every day that there is an alternative, that there is another way," Mitzna said.

Even without Labor, Sharon is expected to face difficulties in forming a stable government.

Exciting play fills time

Basketball best choice among college sports

SEAN PURCELL

The hook will bring you back.

I ain't telling you no lie.

Some poetic words by Blues Traveler to start your day off right.

After a college football season that would rival most any dramatic fairy tale, it would seem college basketball would merely vacate the void left by the now-etched memories of a gridiron year to remember.

Well, drown that thought.

College basketball has again proved why it's my favorite sport to watch. You truly never know what's going to happen. Top rankings are never safe, and each year you have more than one underdog to cheer for.

See, in football you'll have your Iowa States of 2002 – although that fizzled quickly after every man, woman and child jumped on the bandwagon – and your Fresno States of 2001 – the classic "I love David Carr" campaign. I still have my T-shirt, by the way.

In basketball, you can legitimately make a case for six to 10 Cinderella teams every season. This year is no exception.

A man with some K-State ties, former basketball coach Dana Altman, is leading Creighton to a superb season.

After a brief stint in the top 10, the Blue Jays should roll

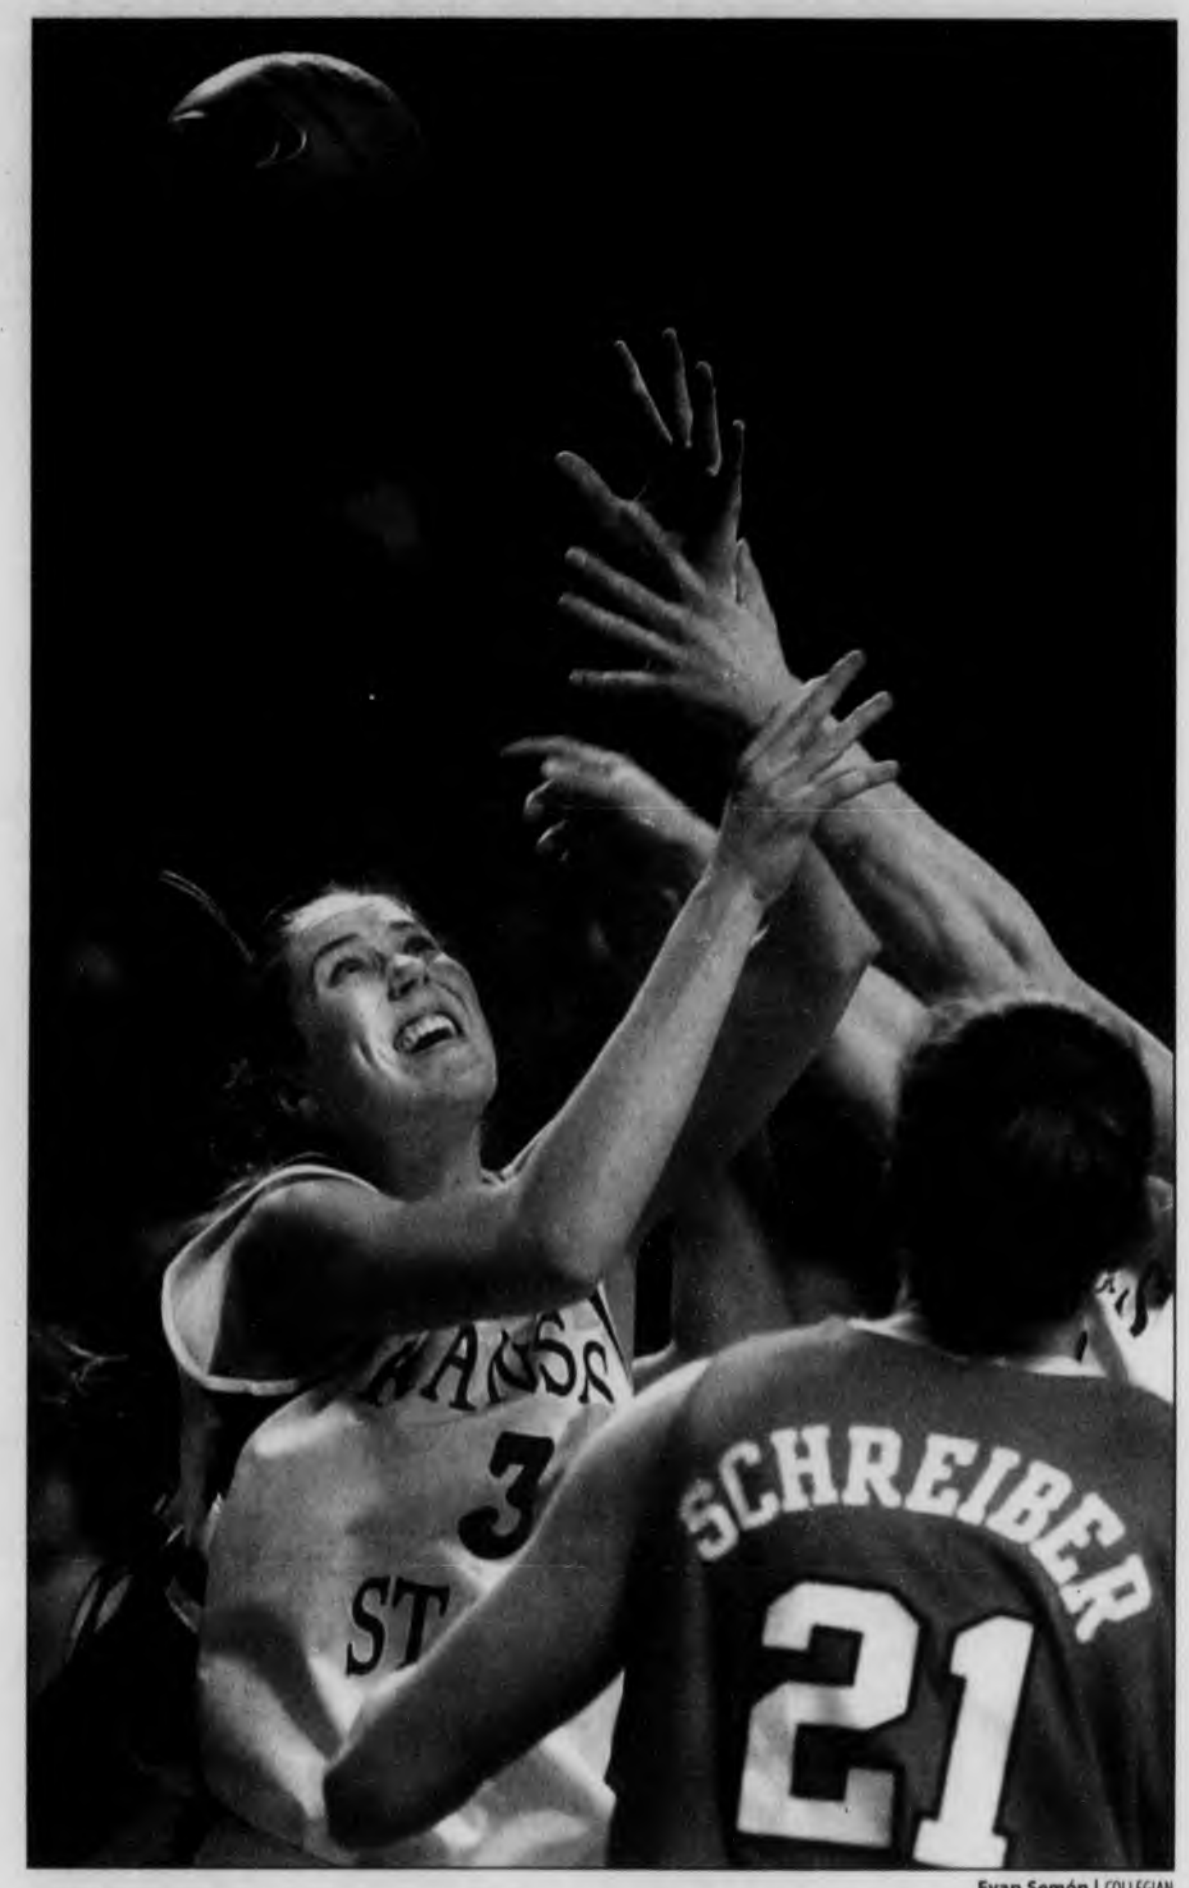
Athletic programs in their infancy often struggle through years of inadequate facilities before solidly establishing themselves. When it comes to the K-State equestrian team, nothing could be further from the truth.

In just its third season of collegiate competition, K-State has already broken the mold when it comes to new programs. Last season, K-State sent four competitors to the Intercollegiate Horse Show Association National Championships where Brandi Vogel, junior in agribusiness, earned K-State's first individual national champion.

More than 150 riders fought through a week-long tryout last fall for the opportunity to fill the 59 positions on the varsity team.



There are many reasons for the rapid success of the program, one of which is the use of Fox Creek Equestrian Center as the team's training and competition home.

"The benefits of Fox Creek far outweigh the drawbacks," said Lon Floyd, director of Catbacker Clubs. "The first year of our program, we didn't have an indoor facility to use and this

Cats focused on execution during trip

By Dan Smith
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It would be easy for the women's basketball players to have big heads coming into tonight's contest against unranked Iowa State in Ames.

Saturday's 71-69 win over then-No. 16/17 Texas provided plenty of memories, not the least of which was a new mark for the best start in school history and a spot alone atop the Big 12 standings.

"Texas was a fun game," sophomore forward Kendra Wecker said. "It was good to beat them here at home."

But when K-State (18-1, 5-0) tips off at 7 tonight in Hilton Coliseum against the Cyclones (7-9, 2-3), don't expect any hangovers from the Cats, Wecker said.

K-State (18-1, 5-0) at Iowa State (7-9, 2-3)
When: 7 tonight
Where: Hilton Coliseum (14,092) — Ames, Iowa
Key stat: The Cyclones are 0-3 against ranked opponents this season, including a 68-60 loss on Jan. 15 to then-No. 4 K-State at Bramlage Coliseum.

"We're focusing in on Iowa State and not celebrating too much on what happened on Saturday," she said.

That's not to say that K-State doesn't recognize what it's managed to accomplish this season.

Owners of a 13-game winning streak and the only unblemished conference record in the Big 12, these Cats have plenty of swing in their step, Wecker said.

"You have to feel confident about your game and be confident in yourself and in your teammates," she said. "It's not something where we walk in every game and say we're undefeated and we can take these guys lightly and we're still going to beat them. That's not the case at all."

Rather, it's a quiet confidence.

And against Iowa State, a team the Cats beat 68-60 two weeks ago in Bramlage Coliseum, Coach Deb Patterson is expecting a similar attitude as K-State tries for its first sweep of the season series

Texas, Nebraska, Arkansas, Baylor, Florida Atlantic, Florida International, Oklahoma, Texas Tech, Washington, and Wichita State.

All these teams played in the NCAA baseball tournament last season.

And all these teams will play K-State this spring.

Coach Mike Clark said K-State is putting in the work it will take to match up against those programs.

"We're just working to get better every day," Clark said. "I think our offense will be good, and we have the chance to be a real good defensive team as well. And we've got good arms, pitching-wise."

College basketball | Video confirms errors

Two timing errors likely caused by the clock operator occurred in the final seven seconds of regulation play in the Texas Tech-Oklahoma men's basketball, a review of videotape footage by Big 12 officials concluded Tuesday.

Oklahoma tied the Jan. 20 game on a last-second shot at the end of regulation and won in overtime. The game's outcome is not reversible but Big 12 officials are taking steps to ensure there is no repeat incident.

The only way for the 48-year-old Norman to qualify now is to move from No. 121 to No. 50 in the world ranking by the end of March, to be in the top 10 on the PGA Tour money after The Players Championships or to win The Players.

City continues to discuss downtown developments

City officials plan for possible changes to business area

By Crystal Welborn
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Future K-State students might have a new Manhattan to come home to – if, that is, the community gives the Chamber of Commerce the thumbs- up.

"This will be a project and a process that will be very open to the public and the university. It will only happen if the community wants it," said Lyle Butler, President and CEO of the Manhattan Area Chamber of Commerce about the proposed renovations of downtown Manhattan.

Butler was careful to note that the proposed renovations were only concepts, and no plans have been finalized yet.

"Nothing has been approved. There are no developers and no formal plans," he said.

"Nobody has approved anything or decided to proceed in any formal way, and we are still exploring a lot of different things."

Formal or not, the Chamber of Commerce has enlisted the help of local architect Brent Bowman of Brent Bowman and Associates Architects to draw up the proposed plans of the downtown makeover.

"My role initially was to be the city's architect, then review the project design," Bowman said.

"We are an architecture firm downtown, so this is a critical thing to us and to me personally."

The concepts for the downtown renovations were envisioned in 1987 when the Manhattan Town Center Mall was added to the downtown area.

"This project is part of a long-range plan that started many years ago with having the mall built downtown," Butler said.

"The long-term plan called for further development on the north and south side of the mall, but it has been sitting on the shelf for many years."

With the new development plans in the works for Manhattan, many residents can only wonder as to what the downtown district would look like with a makeover.

Butler said he and Bowman have been working with business owners and organizations around the community. They have redrawn the plans about 20 times already and plan to have to redo them several more times.

Butler said, however, that the renovations would probably include an additional hotel and conference center, a community center, a Boys and Girls Club of Manhattan center, and retail and business offices.

In addition, there will be significant changes to Manhattan roadways, including extending 4th Street to encircle all of Manhattan and extend Poyntz Avenue to the Manhattan Arts Center on 17th Street.

A proposed undertaking of this magnitude would be expensive, but Butler feels the community would benefit.

"It will be a significant-cost project," he said.

"This is not inexpensive, but what we defined as a project would not just be retail shops and restaurants, but a significant portion would be the addition of housing."

"Successful communities have people living in them."

Tom Phillips, member of the Manhattan Urban Area Planning Board, worked on possible financing of this project and said there have been no real estimates on how much the project would cost.

"It's way too early to answer – this is just a concept that is being discussed in the community to decide if this is even an option," Phillips said. "As far as I know, no one has even put pen to paper to decide how much this would cost."

Butler said that although this project would be expensive, he estimates the money would come from the project's developers.

"We are not talking about capturing money from the state," he said.

"We think a lot of the money will come from the developers themselves."

With new businesses arriving in Manhattan, Butler said he wants the downtown business district to grow.

"The community put so much money in putting the mall downtown, and if we abandon and start developing structures anywhere but downtown, there is a fear that it would slowly die and we don't want to see that happen," Butler said.

Butler said that if the downtown was renovated and more businesses added, there would be more employment opportunities and improve the recruitment value of the city for the university and business district.

"This is a great place to live, play and work," Butler said. "It's a proven factor today that communities that are competing for economic development and bringing new jobs and people to the community are improving the quality of life in the area."

While many aspects of this project are unknown, including the costs and exact changes, one thing is certain – Manhattan citizens won't see the new downtown for years to come.

"This is not something that someone will see developed next week, month or even next year," Butler said.

"This is probably going to be at least a two- to five-year project and probably longer than that."

through the Missouri Valley Conference, on their way to an NCAA Tournament bid – likely a No. 4 seed.

Then there is Louisville. Not until Monday, while watching Kansas defeat Texas on Big Monday, did I realize the job Rick Pitino has done in just his second season at the helm.

The true test for Pitino, though, comes next week when the Cardinals square off against perennial Conference USA power Cincinnati.

Even if you look at the Big 12, not many people can honestly say they picked Oklahoma State to be atop the conference standings by February. Kansas, Texas and Oklahoma all would have been wiser choices, but the Cowboys have proven they can get the job done without Maurice Baker.

If sleeper teams aren't your cup of tea, followers of college basketball have been treated to some big-billed contests in the season's first few months.

Take, for instance, Monday's game pitting the Longhorns and Jayhawks. Like most of you, I rooted against the blue and red, but I was impressed with the level of competition and the pure entertainment of the game.

On one end, you have the best sophomore in the country, Texas' T.J. Ford, doing just about everything humanly possible – and some things not – while one of the best seniors in the country, Kansas' Nick Collison, puts on a rebounding clinic.

It was basketball at its best, and Kansas prevailed, 90-87.

It's been that way all year.

Mediocre Miami scored five points in six seconds to upset then-No. 6 Connecticut.

Oklahoma State beats the buzzer, kind of, to upset Oklahoma. Then a few days later, Oklahoma's Hollis Price, my pick for Big 12 Player of the Year, hits a shot against Texas Tech at the buzzer to send the game to overtime. The Sooners go on to win in extra time.

The weekly upsets, the constant nail biting – isn't college basketball great?

Just a little less than two months until tournament time.

BASEBALL | Cats look to team leaders to step up

Clark's 2002 team finished as one of the best in school history.

K-State finished 30-25 and beat Texas Tech and Baylor to finish fourth in the league and earned the Wildcats' first ever Big 12 Tournament appearance.

The Wildcats return 16 lettermen, 6 position starters, and two starting pitchers from that team.

Despite the strong core, the Wildcats did lose some key pieces following the season.

Clark said he has leaders to spare from the 2002 team.

"Pat Maloney's done a great job," he said. "He's really led by example, worked hard, and been a real positive force for the team.

"Tim Doty has done an excellent job. Gabe Luttrell has done an excellent job. And Kevin Melcher has done a nice job with the pitching staff."

And it hasn't just been these players who have been excelling for the Wildcats since last season.

K-State's fall season might have been the most productive season a Wildcat baseball team has ever turned in.

Clark said the group continues to impress.

"You look at what these guys accomplished last semester when we challenged them and they challenged each other," Clark said. "We had 22 of our 35 kids have a 3.0 or better.

"They've kept these guys really focused."

If the Cats plan to win baseball games in one of the nation's premiere baseball conferences in 2003, and in a rigorous nonconference schedule, they will need to be focused.

They will also need pitching.

One pitcher K-State likely will depend on in 2003 is senior starter Kevin Melcher.

Melcher, who started 16 games on the way to a 5-5 record and a 3.39 earned run average last year, said the Wildcats will be ready to compete.

"This isn't a really young team," Melcher said. "We do have a lot of new guys, but they're not all freshman. We have junior-college transfers, and they've been between the lines.

"We know what we need to do to get this team ready to play. This team is full of leaders."

Senior middle reliever Jonathan Gutierrez will probably be another of the Wildcats' leaders this season.

Gutierrez said K-State is a team working towards championship baseball.

"Each year, we strive to be a better team than we were the year before," he said. "Whether that happens or not is up to us. We decide our own future, and we make our own destiny.

"We just have to go step-by-step and day-by-day, practice and play hard. We are trying to take the strides necessary to make this a championship-type team."

Clark said becoming that championship-caliber team depends on whether his team continues to stay focused on the work at hand.

"We have the opportunity to be one of the best teams I've coached here," Clark said. "No question. But me saying that doesn't mean anything. And those guys saying that doesn't mean anything.

"They have to continue to stay focused and continue to stay motivated. If we can do that, then we have a chance to be a special ball club."

EQUESTRIAN | Facility helps out equestrian team

led to poor practices in cold weather."

This problem was nullified when K-State signed a lease agreement with Fox Creek, giving the team full use of its vast facilities.

"They basically board their horses here, and have full use of our facilities," said owner Dianna Orona. "We have a 36,000-square-foot indoor facility, which includes a large indoor arena, indoor stalls, and a private tack room for the K-State team. We also have a large outdoor arena and three pastures for keeping their 26 horses."

"The only drawback would be the distance," Floyd said, noting that the facility is five miles outside Manhattan. "But again, that's only a minor drawback. They have modern fencing, state-of-the-art facilities, and really provide us our best way to practice and compete."

While the relationship with Fox Creek is the perfect fit for a rising program, there are distant goals of building K-State its own multi-purpose facility north of campus.

"We would love to have our own facility, but we realize it would have to be funded from private donations," Floyd said. "We're working with the animal science college, the athletic department, and the KSU Foundation to eventually have our own facility.

"It would be used not only by the equestrian team, but also the club rodeo team and the animal science department. We'd even like to see an equine therapy center. Researchers are finding very dramatic benefits to using horses as therapy for people with disabilities, most dramatically in children."

While those plans remain based in the future, K-State fans will have a chance to see the team in person this spring as it is host to a Western show Feb. 8-9, an English show March 15, and the English Regional Championships March 16, at Fox Creek Equestrian Center.

HIP-HOP HOORAY

Urban show highlights R&B, rap scene

By Matthew Webber
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

When people think of hip-hop, they seldom think of Kansas. The music director and Disc Jockey for the Urban Show on KSDB-FM 91.9 are trying to change that.

The urban music director, Lafayette Childs II, said changes to the Urban Show, which airs from 8 to midnight every night, can help better represent the university's hip-hop community.

"We want to bring more of the hip-hop culture to Manhattan," he said. "We want it to be something that's organized and structured, a community where people can get together and enjoy themselves and enjoy the music that they like."

He said there already is a large hip-hop scene in Manhattan, "comparable to the rock scene."

"The kids who listen to rock during the day want to hear hip-hop at night when they go out to party. They want to dance to the hip-hop."

He said he wants the Urban Show to be more interactive, similar to the station's morning show. The Urban Show now has more news reports, interviews, contests and giveaways.

The show has added more R & B and underground rap songs to its playlist, as well as songs by local artists.

The DJ schedule also has been restructured. In the past, each DJ had his or her shift on the same night every week, which Childs said led to a disconnected feel. DJs will now share duties from 8 to 10 every weeknight, with their specialty shows airing from 10 to midnight on weeknights and 8 a.m. to noon on Saturdays and Sundays. Freestyle battles may occur on-air after 11 p.m.

One of the urban DJs, Anthony Antoine, also known as DJ Sonryze, is from New York, where he had more access to the hottest hip hop hits.

In terms of playing new hip-hop music, "Kansas is really behind," Antoine said. "My goal is to be aggressive yet professional and let the labels know there is a need for hip-hop in Kansas."

He said he hopes to use his relationships with record label representatives to obtain new songs and mix tapes to play on the Urban Show.

Another DJ, Charlie Rowe, also known as 8-Track, said he agreed with his music director's vision of representing the Manhattan hip-hop community.

"I just want to play music, something different for the people," Rowe said. "I want to give people a shot and send positive messages through music."

Matt Elliott | COLLEGIAN

Tony Antonie, better known as D.J. Sonryze, pulls up the music playlist for the night. He can be heard on KSDB-FM 91.9 10 p.m. to midnight Thursday.

He said he wants to "get Manhattan on the map, get more things than Country Stampede here."

Both DJs said they would play requests, popular hits and songs from less mainstream artists such as the Roots, Blackalicious and 50 Cent.

Childs said he was still looking for DJs, particularly female DJs.

Members of Manhattan's hip-hop community said they liked the Urban Show because of its variety.

"It's something different from the daily thing," Richard Alex, sophomore in computer engineering, said. "There needs to be a stronger hip-hop community. There needs to be more diversity, more culture and that would bring it."

CNS helps keep bandwidth open, monitors use of file-sharing

By Tony Herrman
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Since June 1, 1999 – the dawn of Napster – file sharing has been a touchy subject between.

There are those who have been downloading material from Napster and its progeny, sites like Morpheus and Kazaa, and there are those who have not been able to do certain functions because of network saturation due to downloading.

It was in a memorandum dated May 1, 2000 from Elizabeth Unger, vice provost of academic services and technologies, that "recreational use of software" officially became prohibited.

Richard Becker, network technologies manager, said the memorandum was an "on your honor system that didn't work." As a result, Computing and Network Services began to monitor for abnormal computer use.

"We don't filter out sites. There are certain measures put in place to monitor the peer-to-peer applications," Becker said.

As far as disciplining anyone found engaging in illicit computer activity, Becker said it was case by case.

"It is done in response to individual cases," Becker said. "If there is bad behavior and unacceptable things, we contact housing and let them deal with it."

While there was an outcry across campus K-State banned the use of file sharing, the animosity has waned.

"In the beginning, there were complaints about it. Now they're more of an exception, at least from what we hear," Becker said.

However, students in the residence halls are still upset.

"A lot of people complain because it's illegal and they can't do it," said Jim Klein, resident assistant at Marlatt Hall. "The university has made it illegal. People are obviously not going to be happy, because they want their music for free."

Klein has seen the evolution of the file sharing revolution during his nine semesters at K-State.

"When I got here, it was just starting," he said. "I came from the middle of nowhere where we didn't have access to the Internet. Downloading got real big and became a problem because it took up all the bandwidth. Since K-State made it illegal and CNS blocks the sites, it's not a problem anymore."

For students living off campus, engaging in this recreational use of the Internet is much easier. Alex Scilletta, senior in psychology, said he frequents file sharing sites.

"I love it. I think it's great," Scilletta said "I use the peer-to-peer sites like Kazaa."

Scilletta said he thinks he downloads 10 to 20 gigabytes of material per month.

One of the oldest arguments against downloading free music is that it is robbing the artist who made it. Scilletta said he didn't agree with that.

"As far as music is concerned, I know artists are upset, but from each album a person buys only a few pennies go to the artist, " he said. "I'm not going to be sympathetic to a whiny millionaire who only gets a few pennies out of each sale. Plus, I'm poor."

WOMEN | Forum discusses campus-wide issues

Those in attendance voiced concerns about policies that actually prevented foreign faculty spouses from finding work in the United States while their significant others worked for K-State.

Several sociology and women's studies students attended the meeting. The audience was 20 percent male.

Derek Chiarelli, senior in sociology, admitted coming to the meeting for extra credit, but said he gained something from attending.

"They only give 12 weeks of unpaid (maternity) leave, and most departments don't even support that," Chiarelli said. "I found that surprising."

Angela Hubler, associate professor of women's studies, said there are many things students can do to make changes on campus.

"The most important thing students can do is be educated," Hubler said.

"Being politically aware is a lifetime job. Address the issues with people – don't suggest that you approve by your silence. Students have the power to change the climate on campus that normalizes violence toward and harassment of women."

Speakers emphasized the importance of reporting crimes such as rape and harassment. Without the reports by victims, sometimes financial help was less available to organizations wanting to help students.

Financiers wanted to see the numbers as well as the need.

Dinkel said the Women's Center did everything possible to help women on campus. The center, located in Holton 206, is available to students with questions about violent acts.

SPEECH | Bush raises question of possible war

happen," he said. "It's one of those things where you train as hard as you can and hopefully, if the time comes, we're ready – which we are."

While watching the speech, Derek Yakel, a K-State graduate, said war is unavoidable.

"It will happen. It's only a matter of time." he said.

"Now he's trying to get the support of the American people. I think it's 50/50 right now."

Yakel said the United States will need a good reason to invade Iraq.

"I would support the war effort, as long as we were there for the right reasons," he said.

"Once we do get over there, though, it could turn into another big financial crisis for us."

Marone said the speech helped formalize President Bush's message.

"He had some pretty bold statements about Iraqis torturing children, raping women and dropping acid," Marone said. "I think students have mixed sentiments, but this speech helped influence those who were teetering somewhere in the middle."

Katherine Poole, a K-State graduate, said she watched the speech for reassurance.

"Part of me wants to watch to make sure the president has enough evidence to support that he has biological weapons," Poole said. "After listening to some of the criticisms the past couple months, it's good to come up and watch it."

Instead of running on the track, Poole chose to ride a stationary bike so she could watch the address.

"One hopes that our government is doing the right thing," she said. "President Bush wants to fight terrorism. He's just showing us the way he's going to go after some of these leaders."

Poole said she was glad she watched the speech.

"Overall, it was positive," she said. "He seems to want to restore dignity, humanity and support disease prevention."

Poole said she also wanted to hear how the government will allocate spending in a poor economy.

"Now he just needs to get the economy going and we need Congress, the Senate and everyone to help," she said.

BASKETBALL | Cats look to dominate Iowa State

since 1995.

"I would like to think we have continued to improve and are a little more knowledgeable today than we were two weeks ago overall," Patterson said. "I'd like to think we'll step on the floor and be more efficient in some of the areas we fell short in, but I know they're saying the same thing – we've got a chance to be better."

During the teams' first contest, the Wildcat defense held Iowa State scoreless over the game's final 3 1/2 minutes to stave off a furious Cyclone comeback bid fueled by guard Lindsey Wilson's effort.

The senior finished with a double-double, booking a team-high 14 points and 11 assists.

"Lindsey, over the course of the game, is going to find a way to score the ball, and she's going to be pushing double figures in assists most nights out," Patterson said.

Wilson has had little support on offense, though. No other Iowa State player averages in double figures, and the Cyclones, tied for seventh in the Big 12, manage a mediocre 66 points per outing as a team.

Nevertheless, Iowa State remains a formidable test for the Wildcats, Patterson said.

"It's very early in Big 12 play, and I'm not real sure anyone can be sure who's going to fall where when it's all said and done," Patterson said.

The game could come down to Iowa State's ability to defend one player, though.

In five tries against the Cyclones, K-State's Nicole Ohlde averages 19.8 points, 8.6 rebounds and 1 block per contest, including her 20-point night two weeks ago in Manhattan.

During the first matchup the Cats took the rebounding edge, 40-31, and K-State averages three more boards per contest than the Cyclones.

In fact, the Wildcats top Iowa State in nearly every statistical category.

But even that isn't enough for K-State to take the Cyclones easy.

"The Big 12 is a very tough conference," Ohlde said.

"We saw it last year – it doesn't matter where you go to play, anybody can win. We've seen it this year in the league, too. It's something we're staying focused on, and we're staying true to the stuff we know how to do."

Koehn questionable

Coach Deb Patterson said Laurie Koehn will be a gametime decision tonight against Iowa State. K-State's top three-point threat, Koehn has been bothered by a sore right ankle.

"It's day to day. I won't know until the Iowa State game, and probably 10 minutes before we are sending in the pregame roster, whether she'll play or not," Patterson said Monday.

In 16 games this season, Koehn is averaging 14.3 points and 3.1 three-pointers per outing. The sophomore guard sat out Monday's practice in Manhattan to rest the ailing ankle.

In the Cats' 71-69 win Saturday against Texas, Koehn pitched in 11 points on 4-of-10 shooting, including a 3-for-8 effort from the arc.

"She had had a good week and felt better (against the Longhorns)," Patterson said. "Anytime you go that hard, the real test is the next day or two. We're just not testing her or pushing her in practice scenarios."

ADDRESS | State of Union touches on Iraq war

used all the right rhetoric, but he still has all the wrong policies," said Senate Minority Leader Tom Daschle, D-S.D.

Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., said he would introduce a resolution requiring Bush to present "convincing evidence of an imminent threat" before sending troops to fight Iraq.

"Instead of rushing down the path to war with Iraq, the American people deserve a full debate," Kennedy said.

Top GOP congressional leaders sounded eager to get to work on Bush's legislative agenda.

"We're about to get this ball rolling," said House Speaker Dennis Hastert of Illinois.

"We're ready to go," agreed Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist of Tennessee.

Bush offered no new evidence to support his charges against Iraq, but said Secretary of State Colin Powell will go to the U.N. Security Council next Wednesday to present the U.S. case.

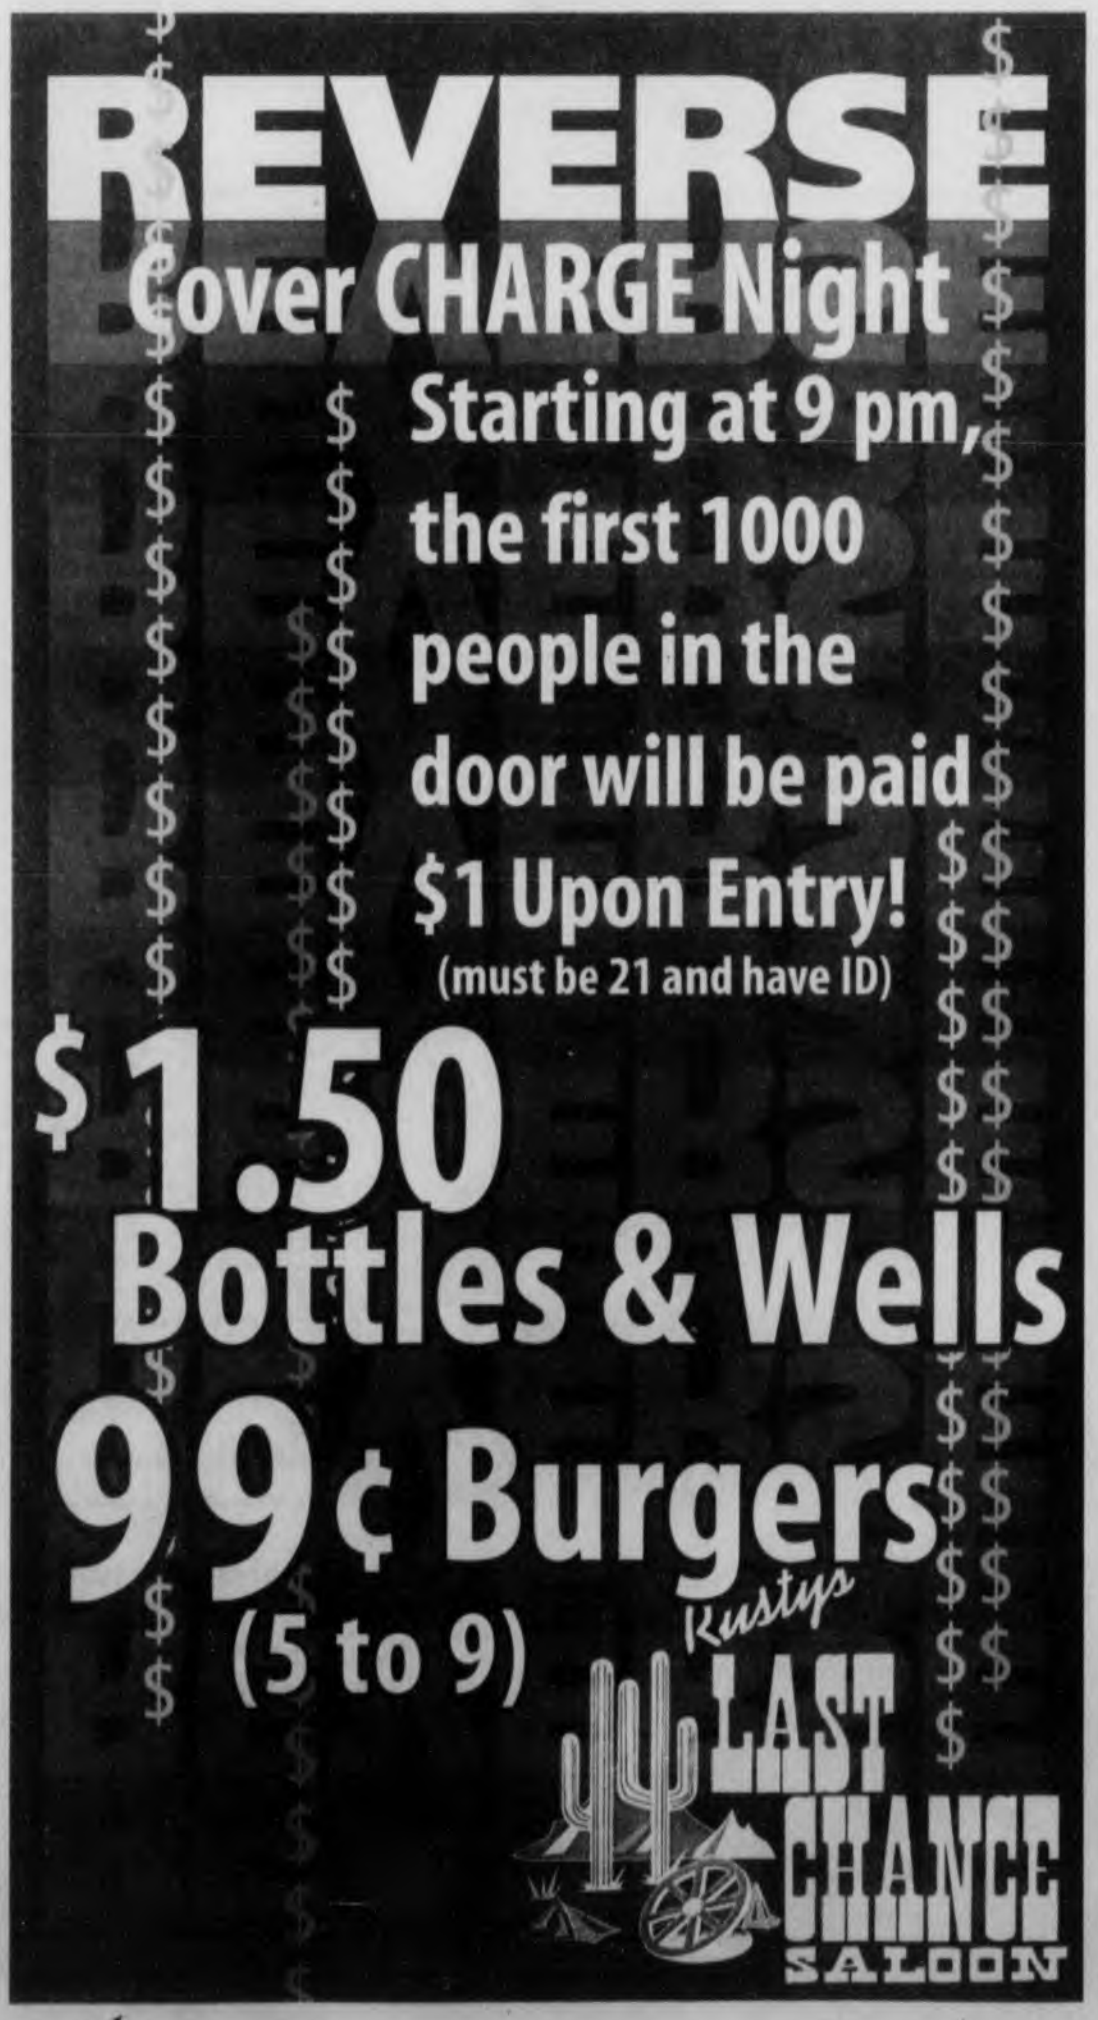
"We will consult, but let there be no misunderstanding: If Saddam Hussein does not fully disarm for the safety of our people, and for the peace of the world, we will lead a coalition to disarm him," the president said. Key allies, including France and Germany, oppose military action in Iraq and want Bush to give U.N. weapons inspectors more time.

Hoping to sway reluctant nations, Bush presented a laundry list of Saddam's alleged offenses, some of them newly revealed to the public. He said intelligence sources have reported that thousands of Iraqi personnel are at work hiding documents and materials from the U.N. weapons inspectors.

Specifically, Bush said Saddam has not accounted for up to 25,000 liters of anthrax, 38,000 liters of botulinum toxin, 500 tons of sarin, mustard gas and VX nerve agent and more than 30,000 munitions capable of delivering chemical weapons.

"If this is not evil, then evil has no meaning," Bush said.

The speech was delivered amid intense security as lawmakers, Cabinet members, military leaders and Supreme Court justices gathered in the House chamber. Several hundred people massed on the Capitol lawn to protest Bush's policies, ranging from a possible war in Iraq to his approach to health care.



The president described the nation as still recovering from recession, terrorist attacks, corporate scandals and stock market declines.

"Our economy is recovering, yet it is not growing fast enough or strongly enough," the president said.

He proposed spending new money for research to develop hydrogen-powered cars and to tutor children of prison inmates. He also called for a new $600 million drug treatment program in which federal money could go to religious community service programs.

In a nod to his conservative backers, Bush called on Congress to ban a procedure critics call "partial-birth" abortions and human cloning.

While Osama bin Laden and other key terrorists elude capture, the president said the United States has caught many commanders and suggested others had been killed.

Kansas State University Student Governing Association

in conjunction with the Office of Student Activities and Services (OSAS)

This newsletter is an effort to inform you, the students of K-State, of the accomplishments and projects of your elected and appointed student officials. It is designed to give a brief overview of the major decisions of the past as well as to inform you of upcoming high-impact issues, so that you may voice your opinions to your respective representative in the Student Governing Association.

PAST PROJECTS

On-Campus Solicitation Policy changes: Legislation was passed to prohibit on-campus solicitors from harassing students. For more info contact the OSAS.

Line Schedule inclusions: Legislation now requires classes that have out of class tests to include those test times on the line schedule.

Pack the Library: Rally for Higher Education: SGA organized protest/rally to demonstrate K-State students' resolution against further funding cuts.

Election vendor change: The e-voting vendor has been changed to a newer and more friendly system. Trial elections have been very successful as compared to elections last year.

Voter registration drive: K-State defeated KU in a competition to increase the political awareness and activism among students.

Privilege fees: Legislation for four privilege fee allotments have passed through SGA with minimal increases.

Allocations to student organizations; Over fifteen organizations have received additional funding through allocation legislation from SGA.

CURRENT PROJECTS

On-Campus Smoking Policy Student Plebiscite Vote: Legislation will be presented in the next month to add smoking policy change questions to the spring SGA election ballot.

Saferide: Efforts will continue toward the adoption of a saferide program for K-State through student privilege fees.

DeadWeek: Policy changes will be discussed to ensure that there will be no assignments, tests, or projects due during the full week prior to finals.

Safer-Housing Week: SGA will be coordinating with the City of Manhattan to schedule free apartment safety inspections for potential renters.

Readership: Legislation will be advanced toward the adoption of the Readership program for K-State.

State Education Day: SGA will be coordinating with other Kansas Board of Regents' Universities to lobby for higher education to the Kansas legislature.

Greetings! Student Senate works continually to enhance the educational experiences for the student body, both in and out of the classroom. In addition, Student Senate plays a significant role in helping to shape policies and procedures that directly affect the entire University community. It is our hope that we can continue to enhance the quality of student life through the continuous communication with the student body.

Sincerely, John O'Hara
SGA Senate Chair

Good day! The judicial branch has been very active this past semester in attempting to become compliant with the Kansas Open Meetings Act (KOMA). Through extra training and concentrated effort, the new procedures have been successfully implemented. The judicial system was also an active participant in the recently passed election code changes. This semester we will work to increase the campus awareness of the judicial system through various campus-wide activities.

Officials, students question whether females are becoming more assertive in dating

Carrie Bradshaw is a sex columnist who is afraid of commitment and surrounded by women who are experimental and even aggressive when it comes to sex.

But Bradshaw is the fictitious leading lady of "Sex and the City," played by Sarah Jessica Parker. Separating fact from fiction is important when it comes to making good decisions in dating and relationships, said Dorinda Lambert, licensed psychologist and associate director of counseling services at Lafene Health Center.

"There is a pressure for some young women to believe they need to be like men, and pressure for men to be like the men in movies and songs," she said. "There is a tendency at times for people to try and emulate models or actors or musicians they think represent how life should be. And in my experience, they are often hurt by that.

"'Sex and the City,' for example, can make it appear as if it's liberating for women to be sexual and carry on more than one relationship."

Lambert, who regularly treats students at Lafene, said it is important for women as well as men to get away from media images to create strong self-identities and healthy relationships.

Even if media are liberated, it doesn't mean dating and relationships have become level ground for both genders. Though feminism has done its part to make relationships more equitable, Angela Hubler, associate professor of women's studies, said, her research suggests there is still a sexual double standard.

"I wish that feminism would have dramatically transformed interpersonal relations between men and women, but based on what I've read, I don't think that is the case," she said. "And whether a girl feels assertive enough to call a boy and ask him on a date, I think, is a pretty superficial measure of social power."

Whether it is culturally accepted for women to be more forward with the opposite sex, the truth is that most of the time people still expect men to take the more dominant role, Abbey Hollembeak, sophomore in life sciences, said.

Hollembeak said she thinks the effects of images of forward women in popular culture are less direct than some think.

"I think they make it so that instances of women being assertive are more socially acceptable, but I don't know that it happens in real life that much," she said. "It's not a big deal if a girl does ask a guy out, but I don't think it's as common as a guy asking a girl out."

Megan McGreevy, sophomore in nutritional sciences, said the change in perspective is a gradual one that can be seen more in each generation.

"People in high school now are used to seeing girls ask out guys more than generations before, but I don't think it will ever be 50-50," she said.

High school may be just the place where the results of that gradual change can best be seen. Brennan Eilert, personal and social counselor at Manhattan High School, said she can see the gender gap closing from when she went to high school just more than 10 years ago.

Eilert said the change has a positive effect on young women as a whole.

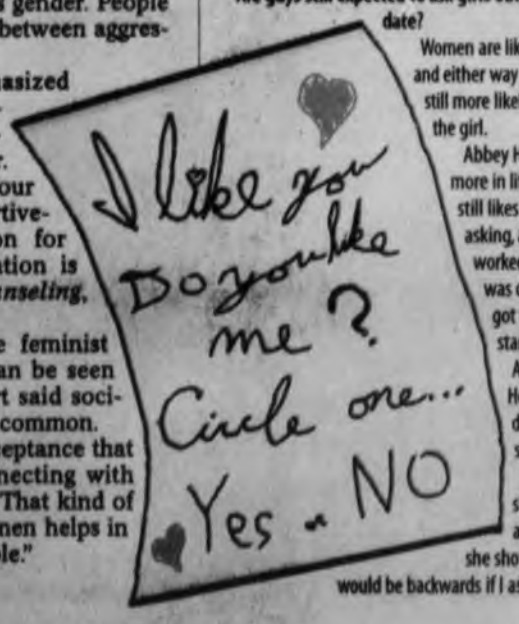
"It encourages young women to figure out what their values are and see how who they date can effect them," she said.

"The girls now are often more independent and stronger-willed instead of being passive in dating and relationships."

A common point of confusion in debating the value of assertiveness in young women is simple definition, as Lambert pointed out. She said people tend to confuse assertiveness with aggressiveness. An assertive person finds the best balance between personal rights and responsibility to others, while an aggressive person can be selfish and brash, Lambert said.

"Most often, when people talk about assertive women, they tend to picture a shrew or someone who is just mean," she said. "They think that's being assertive, and it isn't.

"It's a skill issue that cuts across gender. People need to understand the difference between aggressiveness and assertiveness."



Both Lambert and Eilert emphasized the value of being assertive. Lambert said Lafene is offering an assertiveness workshop this semester.

The workshop will consist of four sessions that will focus on assertiveness and healthy communication for both genders, and more information is available at www.ksu.edu/counseling, Lambert said.

So far, the integration of the feminist message in social relationships can be seen mostly in small ways, but Lambert said societal acceptance has become more common.

"I believe that there is more acceptance that women need to be direct in connecting with people in helpful ways," she said. "That kind of belief and support in women and men helps in making relationships more equitable."

Modern love: basic guidelines in the dating game

Are guys still expected to ask girls out and pay for the date?

Women are likely to ask guys out, and either way is fine, although it is still more likely that the guy will ask the girl.

Abbey Hollembeak, sophomore in life sciences, said she still likes it when guys do the asking, and things have worked out better when she was dating someone she got to know before they started seeing each other.

As far as paying, Hollembeak said that depends on the circumstances.

"Whoever asks should pay. If the girl asks the guy out then she should pay," she said. "It would be backwards if I asked you out to dinner and was like 'OK, you go ahead and pay.'"

When is it inappropriate to hit on someone?

For the most part, anywhere seems to be fair game. People meet at school, work and even church, but sometimes the wrong place can make for an uncomfortable situation.

Megan McGreevy, sophomore in nutritional sciences, said that when she is working, she gets tired of some of the unsolicited attention.

"I'm a waitress, and it's amazing how many people will just flat-out ask you out," she said.

"People are always leaving numbers on receipts and credit card stubs. Do they honestly think I'm going to pick up a business card and just give them a call?"

Hollembeak, who used to work as a lifeguard in Wichita, Kan., said she also felt it was inappropriate when guys would ask her out at work.

She also exercises at the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex, and she said come-ons can be uncomfortable when you're trying to work up a sweat.

"I think the Rec is a bad place to hit on people," she said.

"I get really mad when I see people flirting and hooking up at the Rec. I've been asked out there and I was all sweaty and it wasn't a turn-on at all.

"There are some girls that go to the Rec wanting to find guys, but if I'm going there I want to work out."

Turning someone down: just say no.

Possibly one of the most uncomfortable situations in dating is turning down someone who asks you out.

Guys tend to take a girl's number and just never call her, and girls sometimes avoid the situation completely.

Sometimes a simple no doesn't work, though, McGreevy said.

"It's not easy a lot of times because guys get in their mode and they get determined and you can't tell them no," she said.

"I tell them no, but if they don't take the hint I have to avoid the whole situation.

"You don't want to be mean, because it's usually a nice person and you want to be a friend, but you don't see the dating chemistry."

Local liquor store robbed

Suspect clothed in black steals $300 from retailer

By Adam Lee
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Riley County Police Department responded to a report of an armed robbery shortly before 10:30 p.m. Tuesday at D & R Retail Liquor, 331 S. 4th Street.

The suspect was described as a black male between the ages of 20 and 25, about six feet tall and 150 pounds.

The suspect, entirely clothed in black including a black Nike sweatshirt, a cloth covering his face and a carrying bag, approached the register and pointed a handgun at the clerk, demanding cash.

Do you have information?

Anyone with any information regarding this robbery is encouraged to call the Riley County Police Department at 537-2112 or Crime Stoppers of Manhattan at 539-7777.

After receiving about $300, the suspect fled the scene on foot.

Store co-owner Debbie Miller said employees working at night are instructed to keep a limited amount of cash in the register, and to comply with the robber's demands.

Miller said that the store has taken steps to improve security, including installing a camera, but robberies still seem to occur every couple of years.

"These things happen," Miller said, "We're just happy our employee is safe."

The incident is still under investigation, and there is no indication that it was connected to other robberies in the area.

AOL Time Warner reports loss

Corporation reports losing $44.9 billion

By Brian Bergstein
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK – AOL Time Warner reported a staggering fourth-quarter loss of $44.9 billion Wednesday, largely because of the declining value of the world's biggest media company. Separately, the company announced Ted Turner is stepping down as vice chairman.

AOL Time Warner took a $45.5 billion charge to account for the company's plunging value. Without that "goodwill writedown," AOL said its results actually beat Wall Street estimates.

As for Turner, the former cable TV mogul wants to spend more time on his philanthropic endeavors, AOL chief Richard Parsons said.

"He's concluded now is the right time to make more space for his other activities," Parsons said in a conference call with analysts.

COPING WITH THE COLD

Minda Mays gives instructions to Amanda Dunmire on what she wants on her ice cream cake Tuesday at Baskin-Robbins Ice Cream in Manhattan. Mays was buying the cake for her husband's birthday.

Amanda Dunmire, senior in family life and community services, organizes spoons while working at Baskin-Robbins Ice Cream in Westloop on Tuesday. Regardless of the downtime during the winter months, manager Rhonda Bittle said the store keeps a good flow of business, especially with its ice cream cakes.

Warm-weather businesses adapt to slow sales

By Dan Smith
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Think it's too cold for ice cream?

Rhonda Bittle doesn't buy that excuse.

Bittle, owner of Manhattan's Baskin-Robbins Ice Cream, said the weather is always right for one of the store's 31 flavors, even with temperatures dipping into the single digits this winter.

"My philosophy is, you can eat ice cream any time of the year, and in the winter, it doesn't melt," said Bittle, who is beginning her fourth year in the ice cream business.

Even when traffic in the store slows to only a few stragglers, Bittle said she can always count on die-hard ice cream fans who just can't stay away from their favorite treat.

"People get to know which month their favorite flavor comes out, and they hold out for it," Bittle said.

This month's featured flavor – Love Potion 31, a combination of raspberry and chocolate – is so sought after that the store couldn't keep it in stock long enough to meet the pre-Valentine's Day demand.

"My philosophy is, you can eat ice cream anytime of the year, and in the winter, it doesn't melt."

Rhonda Bittle
OWNER OF MANHATTAN'S BASKIN-ROBBINS ICE CREAM

"It's such a good seller that we actually ran out before our truck got in," Bittle said. "We've had calls and calls over the last few days from people wondering when it's getting in."

Patrons who haven't picked a favorite flavor yet aren't strangers to the store, either. Ice cream cake sales are steady throughout the winter, too, Bittle said, even with snow still on the ground.

Manhattan resident Mindy Mays was in the store around 3 p.m. Tuesday to pick out a cake for her husband's birthday today.

For at least the next hour, though, the store's only occupant was employee Amanda Dunmire.

Dunmire, senior in family studies and human services, said that when business is slow, it's a challenge to think up ways to pass the time.

Language lab helps student workers further own education

By Kelli Pitman
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

As a French minor, Kristen Morrell, freshman in psychology, finds her job a nice addition to her education.

She is a student employee at the Language Learning Center in Eisenhower 1.

This on-campus job employs nine to 10 students and one director. The lab offers computer, audio and video resources for students enrolled in modern language courses.

CAMPUS JOBS

The Collegian takes a closer look at students who earn their college cash on campus.

Most French and Spanish students are required to visit the lab for at least one hour each week while other students can make appointments or walk in during lab hours, which are 9:30 a.m. to 6:30 p.m. Monday through Thursday and 9:30 a.m. to 3 p.m. Friday.

Some of the responsibilities of this job include checking students in and out of the lab, making sure students stay on task, administering placement exams, monitoring movies and offering assistance to the students while in the lab. Occasionally, students will prepare PowerPoint presentations about the lab and modern language opportunities for open houses and other activities.

Lindsey Bauman | COLLEGIAN

Kristen Morrell, freshman in pre-psychology, helps Bryce Trear, sophomore in biology, check out of the Language Learning Center located in the basement of Eisenhower Hall. Morrell is in her second semester working in the lab that employs students who qualify for work study.

"I really enjoy the job, but it is hard when you have to make people do their work," Morrell said.

Students come into the lab on the half hour, and it takes about 10 minutes to check them in. For the rest of their shift, student employees either assist students or work on other work they have to do.

Mireille Green, lab director, said the students do have some down time – when students don't need their assistance – to work on homework or other things.

Green said she hires students at the begin-

Riley County, Mercy reach agreement

By Edie Hall
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Riley County and Mercy Regional Health Center reached an agreement Wednesday that allows both groups to protect their interests in the possible sale of the Memorial/Sunset Campus property.

The agreement allows Mercy to buy the property at 1105 Sunset from the county for a little more than appraisal value, or $1.95 million, Stan Morgan, county counselor, said.

The agreement is conditional on voters' approval or rejection of a Riley County referendum that would allow the county to sell the property.

Morgan said the county believes the property needs to be sold because it isn't involved in the health care

Cannon made by K-State-Salina students used to launch t-shirts at football games

By Emily Meissen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Whether students realize it or not, K-State-Salina is represented at every home football game.

Mechanical engineering and technology students from the Salina campus built and operated the Cat Cannon, the contraption used to launch T-shirts into the stands of KSU Stadium.

"The idea started when KSU built the upper deck of the stadium," said Greg Spaulding, professional engineer, associate professor of mechanical engineering and technology and sponsor of the project. "Willie had a little T-shirt gun, but it could only go about halfway up the stands.

"We thought it would be cool to shoot the T-shirts up to the upper deck. I talked to a student about it, and he ended up designing and building it."

Spaulding said the cannon can shoot a T-shirt 120 yards and more than 300 feet in the air, which gives it the capability to shoot from one goal post through the other and over the stadium.

Bob Henning, senior in mechanical engineering and technology, designed and built the cannon in 2000 after Spaulding introduced the idea to him.

Once he started working on the project, Henning said it only took him about two weeks to complete the cannon. He based the idea off of a paintball gun and off of the design of a small water balloon cannon he had built previously.

"The biggest problem was just trying to find the right angle," Spaulding said.

"We had to make sure it was high enough that it wouldn't hit anyone who was standing near the front of the crowd. We also had to decide what sort of pressures to use. We wanted to make it safe for anyone to use."

With the success of the first Cat Cannon, students formed a 12-member club known as the Cat Cannon Crew. The crew is responsible for operating and maintaining the cannon, being trained in safety procedures and transporting the cannon to games and other activities.

April M. Blackmon | MEDIA RELATIONS
The Cat Cannon makes appearances at every K-State home football game.

"The school wanted something to make it more known on campus," Henning said.

"We thought that something at the football games would be the best. We walk around at the games, you hear people say, 'Hey, that's the Cat Cannon.'

BEST BETS | FOR THIS WEEKEND

1 | BIG 12 SHOWDOWN Don't let K-State's loss at Texas A&M last weekend drain your Wildcat spirit. After all, the men will need your support and then some on Saturday when No. 6 Oklahoma comes to town for a 12:45 p.m. tip at Bramlage Coliseum.

Forward Matt Siebrandt and K-State will be looking for a huge upset Saturday against sixth-ranked Oklahoma. A win would even the Wildcats' conference record at 3-3.

2 | TAKE A PEEK If you haven't already, make the Haskell Indian Nation Photography Exhibit a part of your weekend plans. These 50 new platinum prints are on loan from the Haskell Cultural Center and Museum in Lawrence and won't be around for long. Check them out all weekend from 8 a.m. to 5 p.m. in the Kemper Art Gallery of the K-State Student Union.

See Marlon Brando in the classic film, "The Godfather," showing all weekend at the K-State Student Union.

3 | AFTER HOURS Guys looking for a cheap date? Convince her to take a night off from spending your money in the 'Ville and head to the K-State Student Union. Enjoy movies, crafts, games — even breakfast — from 9 p.m. to 1 a.m. Friday. Best of all, it's free.

4 | "THE GODFATHER" Get one less bottle of beer at Aggie Station on Thursday night and put that $1 to good use. Classic film "The Godfather" will be showing three times this weekend at the K-State Student Union, sponsored by the Union Program Council. Pick your choice of 7:00 p.m. Friday in the Little Theatre, or at Forum Hall on Saturday (7:00) and Sunday (8:00).

5 | LIVE MUSIC No early classes Monday morning? Get your tail down to Auntie Mae's Parlor in Aggieville on Sunday to see Wasted Potential, a local jazz band. Music starts around 9 p.m., and $1.50 margaritas are sure to make the night interesting.

Campaign for Nonviolence begins, continues through April

By Allyson Knight
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Courage. Generosity. Commitment.

These are three of the 64 ways to practice nonviolence during the second-annual Season for Nonviolence.

The campaign, which begins today and continues through April 4, is organized by a committee of students and faculty who strive to counter violence on campus.

> "If we want a safe campus, we need to work for fairness and equity."
> Susan Allen
> DIRECTOR OF WOMEN'S CENTER AND COMMITTEE MEMBER

"The 64 days between Jan. 30 and April 4 give us an opportunity to learn how nonviolent principles and practices can be a powerful way to heal, transform and empower our lives and communities," said Dori Lambert, chair of the committee for nonviolence.

There are several events students and the public can participate in during the campaign.

To kick off the campaign, the first film in a series titled "Young People Creating Nonviolent Change in the World" will be shown at noon today in the Union Little Theatre.

Starting Jan. 31, there will be a beginners' yoga class from noon to 1 p.m. every Monday and Friday in Ahearn Field House Room 301.

The class focuses on the personal aspects of nonviolence.

A community bicycle ride will wrap up the campaign April 4.

During the ride, which will begin on campus and end downtown, people are encouraged to hold up signs supporting the nonviolence cause of their choice.

Every Wednesday during the campaign, students will wear peace T-shirts on campus supporting the Season for Nonviolence. The T-shirts are available at Varney's Book Store and the Union Bookstore.

"The peace T-shirts look like a great way to celebrate the Season for Nonviolence," Nicole Copel, graduate student in art, said. "I am looking forward to wearing it."

Susan Allen, director of the Women's Center and committee member, said the goal of the campaign is to help people learn how to resolve conflicts without resorting to violence.

"Through educational and community action, the Campaign for Nonviolence works to demonstrate that every person can move the world in the direction of peace through their daily nonviolent choice and action," Allen said.

Along with the many activities of the campaign, K-State has added its first nonviolence studies course, Psychology 399, this semester.

Allen said the course is a big step toward adding a nonviolent studies program on campus.

The class focuses on conflict negotiation, history of nonviolence and ways to practice nonviolence.

The nationwide Season for Nonviolence began in 1998 and honors the peace work of Mahatma Gandhi and Martin Luther King Jr.

Allen said she hopes that through the campaign people will realize that violence is not the solution to problems. She also said she wants students to realize that nonviolence begins with them.

"If we want a safe campus, we need to work for fairness and equity," Allen said.

KPR offers diverse music selection, local, national news coverage spots

Show tunes, classical, bluegrass among programming plans for radio station

By James Hurla
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Manhattan radio listeners now have another outlet for Kansas Public Radio.

KANV-FM 91.3, in Olsburg, Kan., began transmitting their signal from a Lawrence-based station, KANU-FM, earlier this month.

Music and news programs dominate KPR's broadcasts, Phil Wilke, KPR media manager, said.

Classical, jazz, bluegrass and Broadway show tunes are only a few of the genres played on the station, Wilke said.

Nine hours of classical music will be played on weekdays, ranging from 17th-century Baroque through modern classical.

There also will be a retro-cocktail hour, which the announcer refers to as "swinging bachelor-pad music of the '50s and '60s."

Wilke said the station offers a wide variety of music to fit many different interests.

"Within each genre, we offer a huge range of styles," Wilke said. "There's something for everyone, no matter what their tastes."

In addition to KPR's original programming, many of the news broadcasts are from National Public Radio, including the programs "Morning Edition," "All Things Considered" and "Prairie Home Companion."

Wilke said NPR has built a reputation of offering fair, accurate coverage of national news. Radio Kansas sends a public radio broadcast to Manhattan as well, KHCD-FM 89.5.

The station, based in Hutchinson, offers many of the same NPR programs, David Horning, KHCD general manager, said.

Horning said KHCD offers a new-age music show from 9 p.m. to midnight, but not as much jazz as KANV.

While the new station is expected to take some listeners from KHCD, Horning said this isn't a bad thing.

"Research indicates people will listen to both," Horning said. "The more public radio people listen to, the better."

KANV's new signal was made possible by a $150,000 transmitter in Junction City. The transmitter acts as a repeater, Wilke said, which picks up the signal from KANU and retransmits it to additional areas.

According to FCC regulations, each tower must have its own call letters, which is why KANU and KANV have different names, Wilke said.

With local and national news coverage, as well as a variety of music programs, Wilke was clear on the station's target audience.

"We would like everyone to listen to it," he said.

OPINION

TO THE POINT

Help available for students with children

If the stress of homework, a job, friends and clubs keep you busy, imagine adding a baby to that mix.

The challenges of balancing the college life and a child can be overwhelming for some K-State students, but they are not alone. Many resources are available to help those students who are struggling.

To the point is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

On campus, the KSU Child Development Center works to lessen the pressures of parenthood. The center offers daycare services for full or part time care for children from 12 months to 12 years of age.

In addition, the center has five programs designed to cater to the developmental needs of each age group. Summer programs and after school care are also available.

Another resource is the the Kansas Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services, which can serve as a big help to parents who struggle financially to support their family.

The SRS helps to supplement income based on the number of hours the parent is already working. They also provide child care at a subsidized cost and affordable health care for children.

In addition to these organizations, young parents should alert their professors to their family situation so that if an emergency occurs, an arrangement can be worked out to make sure the student doesn't fall behind in classes.

Although the pressures of college and family life can be overwhelming, parents should take advantage of the resources available to help them succeed in college and at home.

STAR POWER

Celebrities add political activism to résumés

ZACH HAUSER

"Oh my Lord! I hope I'm the wheat. Right, the wheat you want to be, but not the chaff. What is chaff anyway?" says Ben Stiller.

We're talking about activist celebrities who push their influence into arenas such as politics, morality and family values.

It used to be that the biggest career crossover in Hollywood was going from actor to singer or vice versa, but now it seems more and more celebrities are chomping at the bit to add that "triple threat" trait to their résumé and delve into public awareness.

Today's actors have gone from theatrical performers to being colossal cultural forces with agendas. Big name actors use their fame to further their programs and politics, and it's shameful and wrong.

America has added another slogan besides being the "land of the free." Now, "I saw you on TV ... please tell me what to do" has apparently won the fight and has now ousted rational thought on the technicality of, "I saw him on Letterman."

People are too dependent on what they hear and see and are becoming less dependent on what they believe.

What or who gives celebrity status the connotation of clout? Unfortunately, we do. A connection has been made between makeup, cameras, acting and authority that gives a popular actor the power to run for Congress and win.

Last week in the K-State Student Union, actor Felix Justice used his appearance to exert his opinions on Trent Lott and racial reparations.

Yes, this is all in honor of Martin Luther King Jr., but to be in such an elevated position in society and use your influence on others is just plain ... democracy.

Winston Churchill once said, "Democracy is the worst form of government, except for all the others." But if we're not careful, free speech and the right to bear arms will soon be no match for the charismatic actor and their political endeavors.

This irresponsibility follows suit into another profession – those who are religious leaders. The power of religion, however, isn't driven by popularity, but by faith and conviction. A priest has a profound effect over his congregation, but to use the pulpit to preach about why taxes are ridiculous is ridiculous.

So why would we condone an actor's crusade for racial reparations, while at the same time find it appalling for a Catholic Bishop to be president?

The hypocritical answer is more or less, religion has no place in government, but it's fine with me if Joe the middle-school dropout who works as a night janitor teaches my kids in elementary school.

There's just no sanity or consistency left in our wishy-wash society. Everyone seems just dissatisfied enough with their job to keep it, but do exactly not what's in their job description.

It's great that people want to better themselves, the world, whatever – but if you're a telephone solicitor for Cox Cable, and you use all your phone time at work to do a one-man telethon for the impoverished people of Somalia, shame on you.

Groundhog Day: six weeks of waiting is better than war

LAYTON EHMKE

The real groundhog day was Tuesday, in George W. Bush's State of the Union address. This is where Bush worked to convince us how much Iraq has been evading cooperation and that they should receive a few mushroom clouds for Valentine's Day.

This country should keep its pants on before deciding to blast Saddam Hussein out of his hole.

Colin Powell said Monday that he didn't have any faith in the U.N. weapons inspectors, and the Bush administration threatens action in a matter of weeks.

Could this be the foreshadowing that is Groundhog Day? Or will Wharton Willy say we have six more weeks of waiting around for war? I say we let Saddam show his power, or lack of, completely before we "cure the headache by cutting off the head" ("Platoon," 1986).

The U.N. heard nonconclusive reports of the possibilities of weapons of mass destruction on Monday. So just because Iraq is giving the world the old fashioned runaround, doesn't mean the United States has the right to squash it like a roach.

Goodness, we've got Iraq in a stranglehold already, so why are so many people so pumped to follow Bush into Iraq with guns blazing?

It may be because our economy is crumbling, or it may be that most people in this country want revenge from Sept. 11, to which there have been no solid links to Saddam. Any way you cut it, Iraq is totally boxed in right now.

War is truly unneeded. We have all the time in the world to avoid war, which is exactly what should be done. Do you realize that 75,000 U.S. soldiers would be needed in Iraq for up to five years after a war? Who wants that? I surely don't.

Chief U.N. weapons inspector Hans Blix reported that more needed to be done before anybody pulls a trigger. There has to be conclusive evidence to back Bush's apprehensiveness about invading Iraq. If there is strong evidence, let's see it.

At least the Bush administration has ruled out any military action before Feb. 14, so that Blix and his team can continue their work. But the following weeks (not months) should be interesting.

The New York Times reported that Russian deputy foreign minister Yuri Fedotov told the Interfax news service that Blix had delivered only an interim report, and that Iraq should have a chance to make good on recent promises to cooperate fully with U.N. inspection teams.

America charging in before that happens would split the U.N. coalition. The United States has produced no real evidence that Iraq has violated the most recent U.N. resolution demanding unconditional compliance with weapons inspections.

"This is the only way to clear the last queries concerning weapons of mass destruction in Iraq," Fedotov said.

There has to be conclusive evidence to back Bush's apprehensiveness about invading Iraq. If there is strong evidence, let's see it.

The New York Times also reported that Russian Foreign Minister Igor Ivanov said in an interview with the Arabic news channel Al-Jazeera that an American attack on Iraq without U.N. approval "would deal a very heavy blow to the unity of the international community and the international anti-terrorist coalition."

America cannot handle that kind of risk, although some would say that risk is the name of the game.

So, will the groundhog predict six more months of weapon inspections, or will someone cast a shadow of war in the coming weeks?

Mohamed ElBaradei, head of the International Atomic Energy Agency, told the council that there was no evidence that Iraq had revived a nuclear weapons program dismantled in the early 1990s. I support more time for the weapons inspectors to complete all examinations before pouncing Iraq. Even the suggestion of war is totally avoidable.

CAMPUS FOURUM | 395-4444

Why do Cornhusker and Jayhawk fans go to K-State? Get out!

Yeah, I'm not a midget, but I'd like to apply for the position.

My roommate killed my pet onion.

Oronde for president — O-R-O-N-D-E.

I just want everyone to know that I'm not Kelly Osborne!

I got two words for you: O.J. Oronde — O-R-O-N-D-E.

When I came from sabbatical, I found out that someone sold the educational radio station signal. Whose moronic idea was that?

Yeah, this is to the protesters: If you want peace, you can have a piece of my butt.

I just inherited $50 million. Will somebody sleep with me? No seriously, $50 million.

To the war protesters: I want peace, too — a piece of pizza.

What do you get if you stand outside of the Union and you have no idea what you're talking about? Oh yeah, you're a peace protester.

I love hazing.

What happened to the hot chick that was on the recorder? Bring her back.

To all you dorm rats: I had a good time with your girlfriends in my frat room last night.

My roommate's girlfriend is PMSing, and I have to deal with it more than he does.

It's my roommate's one-year anniversary, and I'm convinced he's still gay.

Is it bad if your roommate's girlfriend smells like fish?

Masturbation is sex with someone I dearly love.

I love Bush — well, at least, the president.

Greeks rule, dorm rats drool.

Life's short and hard like a body-building midget.

Big Gulps, eh?

I went into Lafene yesterday for a cold and ended up having to take four pregnancy tests.

All right, brain. I don't like you, and you don't like me. So, let's just get this over with so I can go back to killing you with beer.

Yeah, Shania Twain's always been able to get meat. Up! Up! Up!

I just wish everyone would get off Celine Dion's back. She's doing great things for the French-Canadian people.

Where would the French-Canadians be without Celine Dion?

I hate Democrats.

This isn't the State of the Union. It's Republican agenda crap.

Yeah, I was just watching the State of the Union address, and I was wondering if mispronunciation of the word "nuclear" is grounds for impeachment.

It wasn't me. It was Satan.

This is my 12th semester at K-State, and I have yet to pick up a Collegian that was worth the time to pick it up.

That damn eye doctors commercial is so annoying.

Local charities suffer budget cuts, need donations

By Crystal Becker
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Local charities are facing difficult choices as budget cuts run rampant in a poor economy.

Tom Hawk, director of the Riley County United Way, said his organization usually receives a grant from the federal government to help fund 13 local charities, but this year the grant was reduced by 24 percent.

"The campaign that we just finished up came in shorter than our goal," Hawk said. "Fortunately, the board was able to make some adjustments and still help the agencies without a huge cut, but they did take some cuts."

Ken Scroggs, executive director of Big Brothers and Big Sisters of Manhattan, said all area charities are in the same boat.

"When the economy downturns, foundations and people that normally donate money have to cut their donations because they don't have as much to give out," he said. "We try to find other sources of income and push local events to make up the difference."

Big Brothers and Big Sisters will increase their fund-raising goal by $21,000.

He said the problem is complicated since the charity is helping an additional 147 children this year.

"It's a two-fold problem. We're seeing an increase in people looking at the services we have," he said. "Now couple that with a decrease in funds, and you end up with a major problem."

The competition among non-profits has increased as well, said Clay Myers-Bowman, executive director of the Flint Hills Chapter of the American Red Cross.

"Every year, there are more and more non-profits asking for money," Myers-Bowman said. "In the last year, there have been two major capital campaigns here in Manhattan. One for Mercy hospital and one for the Chamber for economic development."

Myers-Bowman said local chapters of the American Red Cross have suffered since the Sept. 11 attacks.

"The American people gave $1 billion across the country to the national Red Cross following 9/11," he said. "A lot of our donors that would have given money to the local chapter gave money to the national chapter instead."

Myers-Bowman said the organization will be doing more aggressive fund raising than ever before. He said the Flint Hills Chapter of the American Red Cross will try to raise an additional $25,000 this year.

"We've not really cut back on any services, but we have cut back on staff," Myers-Bowman said. "We had to cut a half-time office manager position. We're really watching how we spend money and trying to be very frugal with the funds we do have."

Myers-Bowman said there are also plans in the works to do more grant writing and personal solicitations to donors.

"We're still here and ready to provide services to families who experience fires or other major disasters," he said. "We teach first aid and CPR classes, do community education and disaster relief, train students for disasters and give presentations to classrooms, adults and other groups."

Myers-Bowman said the committees assure United Way donors that their money is spent wisely.

"I think the directors of these agencies will stretch the dollars as much as they can. They'll still provide the services, I'm just hoping we don't get to the place where we have to turn people away," he said. "The requests for utility assistance exceed money every year, now it will be even tougher with budget cuts."

Hawk said anyone able to donate should.

"Anyone who has a job in these times should try to be more charitable than they have in the past because the need has been increasing and it will continue to increase," Hawk said. "Most of us have to really look deep inside ourselves and ask what we care about and if we're really willing to look forward and help those in need.

"The next couple years will be a real test in our level of compassion and giving."

Lafene offers anonymous way to gain personal assistance

By Abbie Whited
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

If you've ever wanted help with a personal issue but weren't comfortable asking anyone, the staff at Lafene Health Center has created a new questionnaire to help ease that discomfort.

"Our Concern For Your Health" was put into practice at the beginning of the semester to give students the opportunity to voice their concerns indirectly.

"The questionnaire was merely designed to bring up topics so students can ask us for more information. It addresses many issues that are troubling to students – issues that are fairly common among college students," Jay Reppert, medical director at Lafene, said.

This questionnaire is optional and confidential. It is offered to students who already have their medical histories on file at Lafene.

On the questionnaire, students are asked to respond to certain aspects of their lives, such as wearing seatbelts, drinking, depression and tobacco use.

Students can receive information about these topics if they would like to, Reppert said, but their responses will not affect the type or quality of treatment they will receive.

Kennedy said the main goal is to help students.

"We hope to provide students with written information to prevent illness or disease. We want to help them be more aware of and make better decisions about their health," said Carol Kennedy, director of health education and promotional services for Lafene.

"There is no statistical analysis of the answers. That's not the intent of this questionnaire."

While the questionnaire has been in use for only two weeks, Reppert and Kennedy said they feel it is a success with students so far.

"Approximately 100 percent of students who were offered the questionnaire responded to it," Reppert said. "Patients seem to be very accepting and appreciative of it. We don't want this to be an offensive thing at all."

Liz Hendrix, junior in secondary education, has not yet filled out the questionnaire but thinks it's a good idea.

"Knowing that it's confidential, you feel comfortable asking for information about things like depression, STDs and date rape," she said.

"It doesn't force people into uncomfortable situations. There are certain problems that a doctor would need to know about that people don't necessarily want to just bring up," Nash Krekovich, sophomore in graphic design, said.

Students who respond to the questionnaire wanting to receive information about tobacco cessation may be directed to one of Lafene's new programs, K-Staters Inspired to Stop Smoking.

"We have always offered counseling for students who want to quit smoking. We came up with this concept to promote that we offer support," Kennedy said.

"There are four main areas that we are using in the campaign to get the message out – better health, better breath, more money and a chance to come in from the cold," she said.

KISS advises students to visit Lafene to develop a plan to quit smoking.

"Medication can be prescribed, or students can be directed to counseling services," Kennedy said.

Saddam says Iraq ready to take on American attack, 'destroy and defeat it'

By Charles J. Hanley
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

BAGHDAD, Iraq – Saddam Hussein, in remarks televised Wednesday, said Iraq "has huge capabilities" and is ready to face a U.S. attack, "destroy it and defeat it."

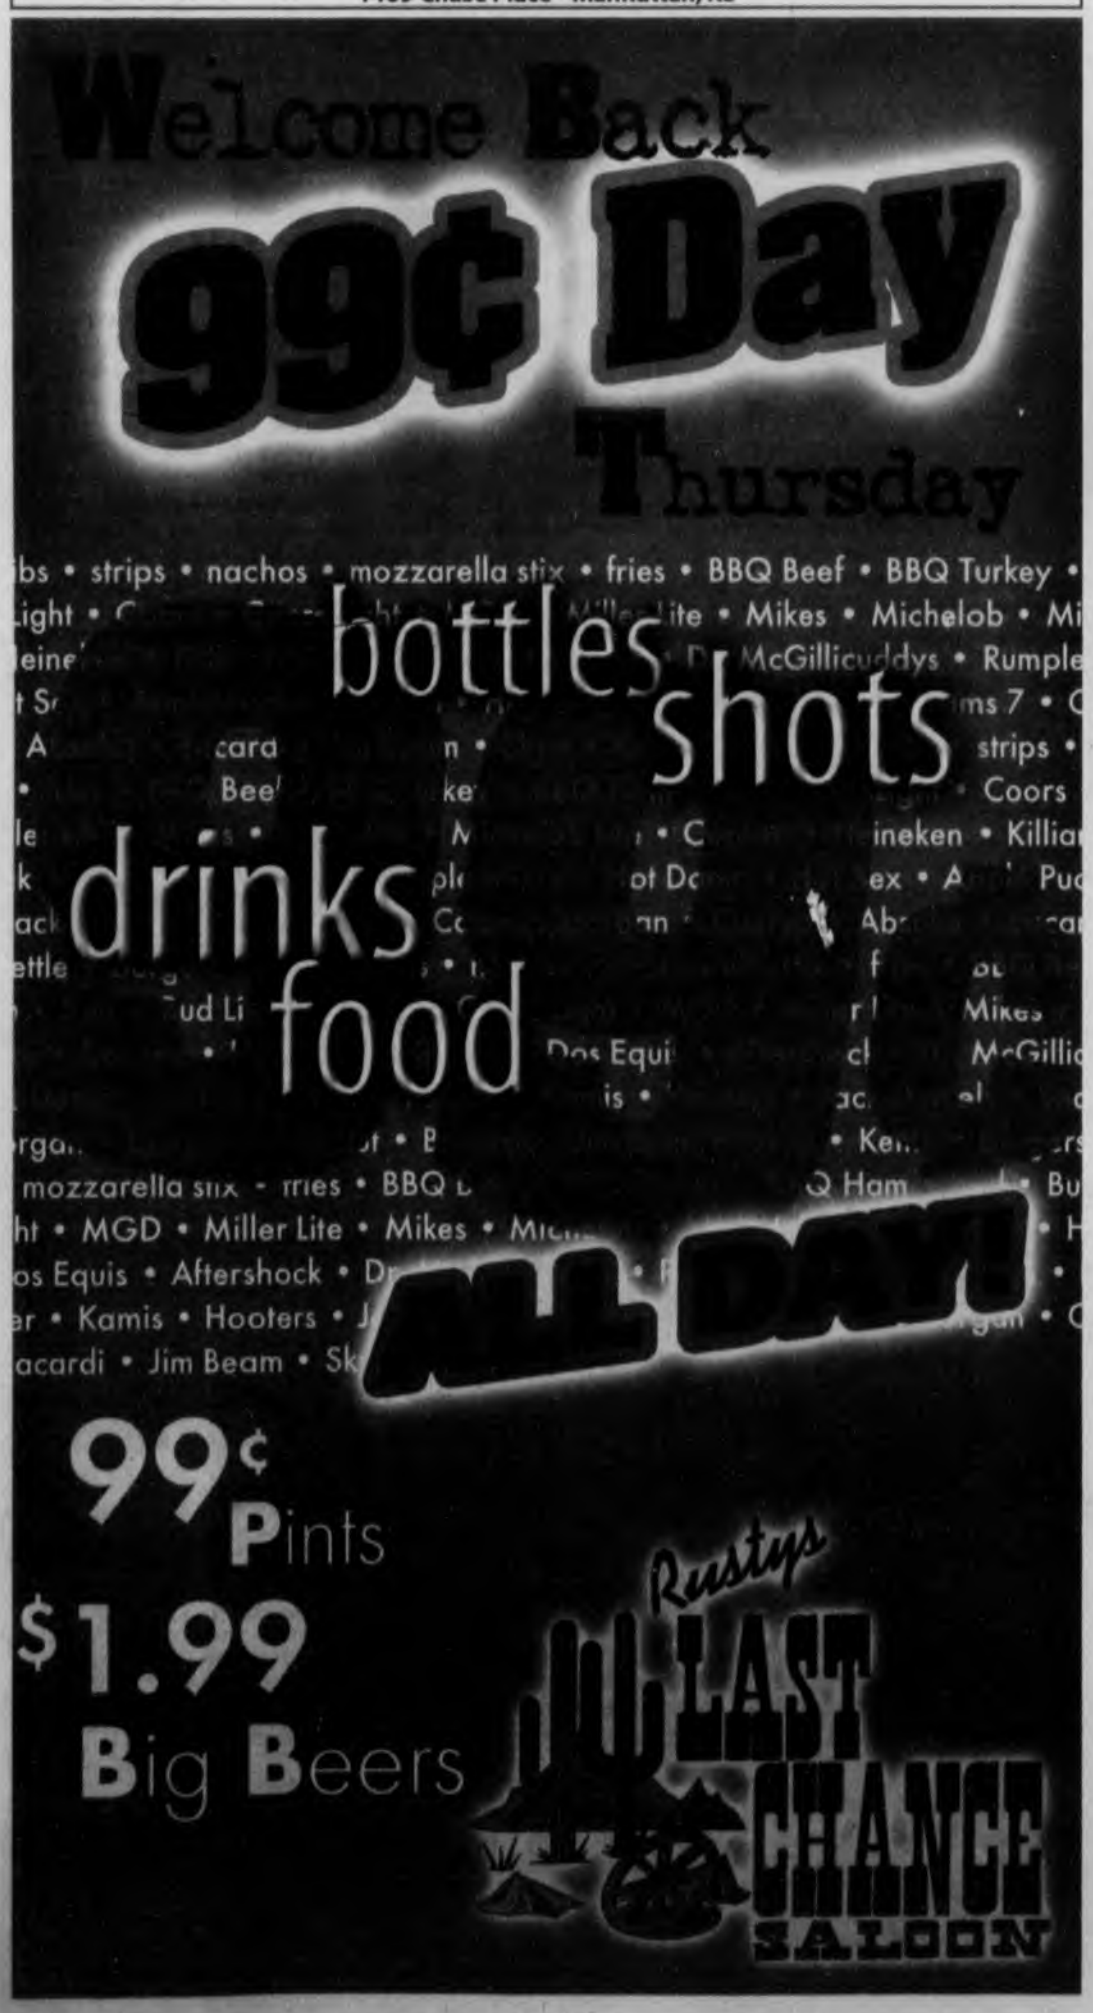
A senior Baghdad official condemned President Bush's State of the Union speech, saying it was filled with "cheap lies."

"When faced with an attack, we always put in our calculation the worst case scenario and we build our tactics on that," Saddam told military commanders. "We know that they are coming with large forces of infantry and armored units to storm our defensive positions. But we will absorb the momentum of the attack, destroy it and defeat it."

Saddam said the Americans have no right to attack Iraq "and every one of them, from the top down to the smallest soldier, is coming as an aggressor with ambitions."

"We will have long successive defense lines with continued support of equipment," Saddam said. "Iraq is not Afghanistan. Iraq has huge capabilities and throughout history, Iraqis never allowed foreigners to stay on their homeland."

The broadcasts appear aimed at rallying the Iraqi population at a time of crisis and sending out the message that Saddam remains in firm control of the military and civilian leadership.



Ordinary Iraqis, meanwhile, voiced growing fears of a new U.S. war, a conflict one doctor saw as a "catastrophe" in the making for civilians.

International arms inspection teams pressed on with their unannounced rounds Wednesday, dropping in on an Iraqi missile-fuel plant, an ammunition depot and other sites, as their chiefs prepared to meet behind closed doors with the U.N. Security Council in New York.

Iraqi officials said they would submit their own rebuttal to the United Nations by Thursday, "clarifying" points raised by the chief inspectors.

Aggressive Cyclones shut Cats down on the road

ISU's superior start makes Cats struggle

By Ben Fehr
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

AMES, Iowa – Flow.

Key to any offense's ability to score points at some semblance of a regular clip, flow can win a game or lose one just as quickly.

Prior to Wednesday night's tilt with Iowa State, Coach Deb Patterson said her team's ability to get into a flow was something she felt good about.

"I really like the way we are getting into and moving around in our offense," Patterson said. "We continue to improve and get better as we move through the offense.

But it was the Cyclones who were able to get things going first.

Iowa State shot out to a 4-0 lead on two baskets from sophomore post Lisa Kriener, and at the 9:27 mark of the first half had the No. 3 team in the country down 20-11.

Patterson said the poor start put the Wildcats in a hole they were never able to claw themselves out of.

"I think we really squandered the first three or four minutes of that basketball game with some very poor basketball decisions," she said. "From that point on, I think we emotionally struggled to feel a sense of confidence.

"We dealt with getting into foul trouble and we were throwing the ball away recklessly on the offensive end. I don't think the five we had on the floor to start really, as a unit, played well or were well prepared."

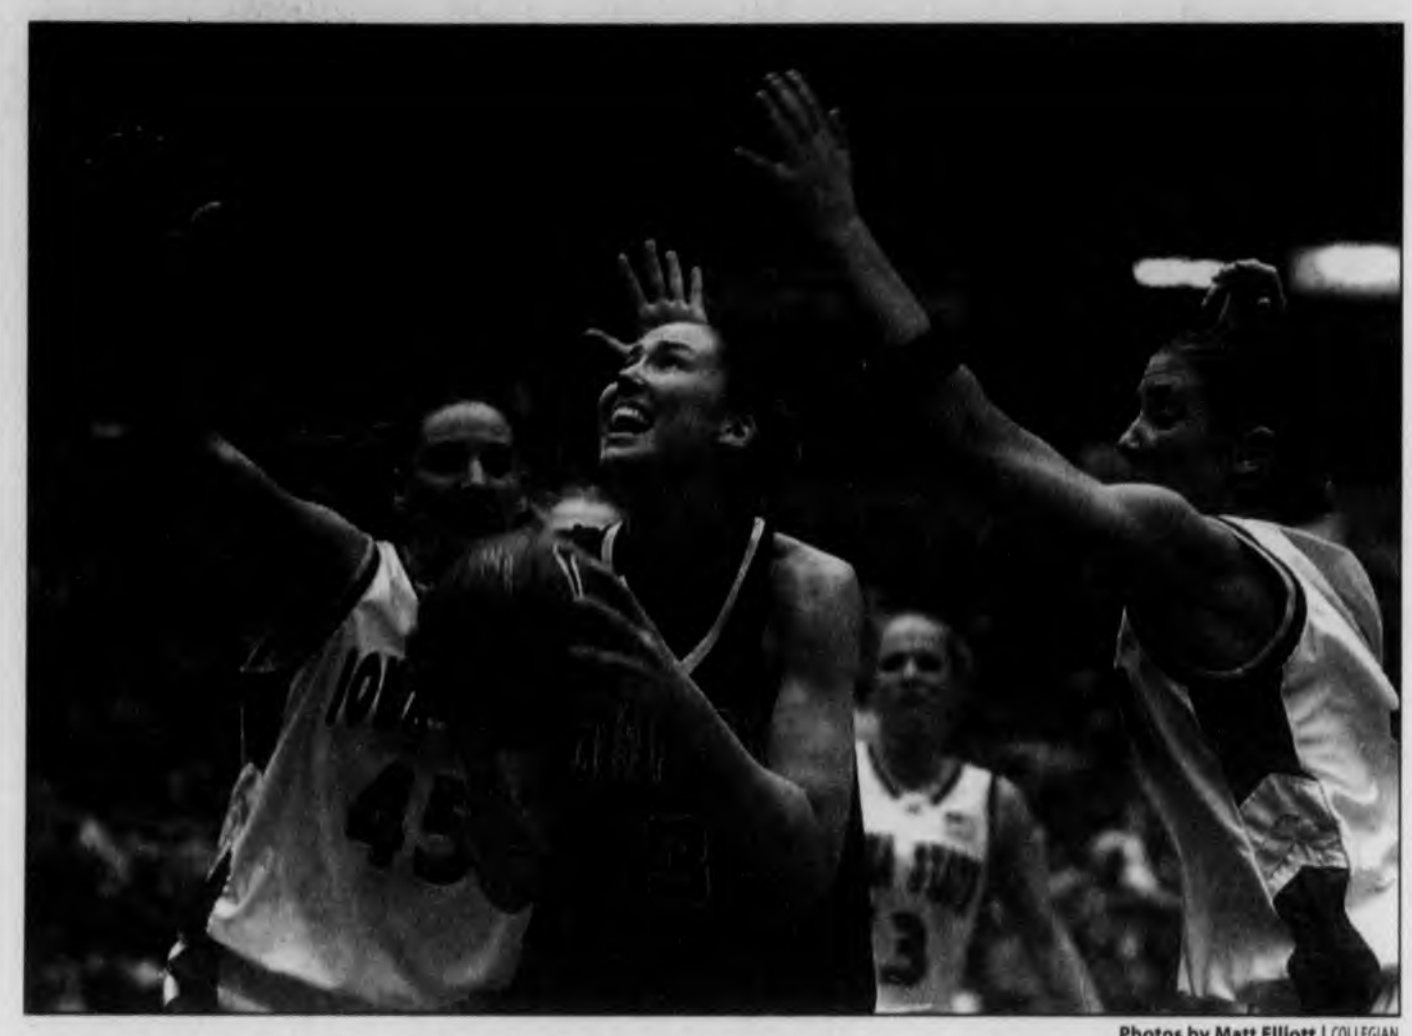
K-State was able to get back within two before intermission, but the Cyclones took a 38-30 lead into halftime.

The normally hot-shooting Wildcats, a squad that was averaging 50-percent shooting coming into the game, managed just 37 percent in the first half and went two for 10 from beyond the arc.

Things would improve in the second half. K-State shot 51 percent from the field and was four of 10 from behind the line.

But Iowa State coupled its solid defense with 58 percent shooting and 3 long-range bombs in the second half. Iowa State led by as many as 14 in the second half and pulled off the upset, 74-69.

Coach Bill Fennelly said the defense Iowa State used to frustrate K-State's attack didn't happen by mistake.



"We made the decision from the very beginning," Fennelly said. "The last time we played them, we concentrated on and tried to double team Nicole Ohlde, they were kicking and Chelsea Domenico has a career night.

"We decided tonight we were going to let Nicole Ohlde shoot until her arm dropped off. We were going to try and not give up threes, and double team her on occasion. I

Cats' best start ever, 14-win streak ends in Ames; Patterson names inconsistent offense as problem

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State's Brie Madden and Iowa State's Lindsey Wilson scrap for the ball during K-State's 69-74 loss in Hilton Coliseum. The loss was the Cats' first in 14 games this season.

AMES, Iowa – Lindsay Wilson is tough enough by herself. With the rest of the Iowa State team behind her, the Wildcats never stood a chance.

Wilson led all scorers with 27, including 15 in the first half, and the Cyclones (8-9, 3-3) got double-figure scoring from three others in a 74-69 upset over No. 3 K-State (18-2, 5-1) on Wednesday night in Ames.

"This is pretty big," Wilson said, "given the fact that we're not ranked and they're third in the country."

The Wildcats led only once in the contest, at the 16:44 mark of the first half, as the Cyclones struck early and stayed hot from the field in ending K-State's 5-0 start in the conference schedule.

K-State lost for the first time in 14 games despite getting a career-high 22 points from Megan Mahoney, 21 from Nicole Ohlde and 10 from Kendra Wecker. The loss also halted the Wildcats' best start in school history at 18-1.

The Cyclones' Mary Cofield spotted up for a three-pointer at the 13:09 mark to give Iowa State a 15-11 lead early in the contest. The long-range jumper opened an 8-0 run that buried any shot at a quick answer for the Wildcats.

K-State would turn the ball over three times during that stretch, as the Wildcats went more than 3 1/2 minutes without a basket while the Cyclones built a nine-point advantage with 9:27 left in the half.

"Early on, they just came out really aggressive and we just weren't getting to spots," Ohlde said. "We weren't taking our time on offense and really shooting the gaps. That's what happened at the beginning of the game."

After a 20-second timeout, K-State managed a 9-2 run to cut the lead to three, but the Cats went cold again as Anne O'Neil's jumper with under five minutes to go in the half gave the Cyclones a 12-point lead on way to a 38-30 halftime cushion.

The two dry spells were part of a 37-percent shooting half for K-State, compared to the Cyclones' 50-percent performance during the same time.

Wecker's three first-half fouls didn't help matters, either. The Cats' top producer on offense scored just four points in eight minutes in the game's first period.

"It was definitely hard sitting on the bench with foul trouble," Wecker said. "But I think our team hung in there and battled hard. They made some good defensive stops and we felt good going into halftime only down eight.

Consistency on offense, a concern Coach Deb Patterson addressed earlier in the week, was a problem from the tip.

"They came out really intense and really aggressive," Ohlde said. "We weren't patient, we didn't get to spots and we didn't do the things we were capable of doing."

The Cyclones notched 18 points on K-State's 10 first-half turnovers, and Iowa State's defense did the rest.

"They mix it up a lot on defense," Wecker said. "We got good looks, but we just didn't shoot the ball very well tonight."

Cold shooting plagued the Cats in the second half as well. K-State missed seven of its first nine shots after the intermission, and Cyclone Mary Fox gave Iowa

NBA | Pacers' Artest suspended

Indiana Pacers forward Ron Artest was suspended for four games Wednesday for his run-in with Heat Coach Pat Riley and flashing an obscene gesture toward the crowd.

Artest also committed a flagrant foul on Heat guard Caron Butler by pushing him into the stands in Monday night's game in Miami.

The suspension, announced by Stu Jackson, NBA senior vice president of basketball operations, will cost Artest about $84,000 in pay. It started with Wednesday night's home game against the San Antonio Spurs.

MLB | Virginia wants committment on future of Expos

Virginia officials want baseball to conditionally approve a move of the Montreal Expos to their area before completing financing plans for a new ballpark.

Baseball's committee completed its first round of meetings with the three contenders for the Expos — Northern Virginia, Portland, Ore., and Washington — and all three areas said financing for a new ballpark dominated discussions in their bids to lure the Expos from Montreal for the 2004 season.

Northern Virginia — which would build a ballpark in Arlington, Fairfax or Loudoun counties outside Washington — enacted legislation in 1997 to partially fund a ballpark with revenue generated by sales and income taxes generated by a new team and a tax on tickets.

NBA | Utah coach suspended

Utah Jazz Coach Jerry Sloan was suspended for seven games by the NBA on Wednesday for shoving an official.

Sloan and official Courtney Kirkland exchanged words face-to-face in the first quarter of the Jazz's 102-92 victory at Sacramento on Tuesday night.

The coach argued that Kings guard Doug Christie stepped out of bounds on the sideline right near where Kirkland was standing.

Sloan then pushed Kirkland in the chest and was ejected. As Sloan was escorted away by arena security, he motioned for Kirkland to come toward him.

Golf | Woods to find out when he can return

Tiger Woods only made it look easy.

His dominance became even more impressive Wednesday when he revealed that pain in his left knee was so intense last year it made him sick to his stomach, and he had to take injections just to keep playing.

Despite benign cysts that made his knee ligaments inflate like a balloon, Woods became the first player in 30 years to win a season's first two majors. He ruled golf for a fourth straight season, winning a total of six times.

Imagine how he might play if healthy.

Woods could get an answer soon. He received clearance from his doctors Saturday to hit a driver and as many practice balls as he wants. He'll decide next week whether he is fit enough to return Feb. 13 for the Buick Invitational in San Diego.

NCAA | Arizona players accused of taking candy

The Arizona athletic department is investigating whether its basketball team stole money and up to 80 candy bars from a vending machine in Lawrence, Kan., last weekend.

Lute Olson, coach of the No. 1 Wildcats, called the accusations "nothing but hearsay and rumor" at his weekly news conference Tuesday.

An unidentified Wildcats coach reimbursed the Marriott Spring Hill Suites in Lawrence for the missing candy. Associate coach Jim Rosborough said the payment was less than $100.

Tennis team returns to action Friday as host to Southwest Missouri State

By Wes Marfield
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The No. 53 K-State tennis team will return to the courts Friday when they are host to Southwest Missouri State at noon in Ahearn Field House.

Up eight spots from No. 61, the Cats are hoping to continue their hot start after knocking off BYU 4-3 in Friday's season opener.

The Lady Bears, coming off their first ever NCAA Tournament appearance, have started their season 0-2, including a 4-3 loss to Tulsa on Sunday. They dropped their season opener to Arkansas, 6-1.

Ia Zozrashvili will lead SMS against the Cats. Zozrashvili, No. 25 in the Central Region and No. 1 singles player for the Lady Bears, is 0-2 this season in singles competition.

Andrea Cooper plays in a match against BYU Friday where the Cats beat the Cougars 4-3. The team will play host to Southwest Missouri State Friday at Ahearn Field House.

Matt Elliott
COLLEGIAN

Despite their winless record, Coach Steve Bietau isn't looking past SMS and is predicting a competitive match.

"I expect a tough match, and I hope that our players are preparing themselves for a tough match," Bietau said.

In preparation, Bietau is looking back at the BYU dual to determine what areas each of his players need to work on.

"Our practice this week has been focused on things that presented themselves in the BYU match," Bietau said. "It has been more of an individual approach to each players game and what they need to do."

Overall, Bietau was pleased with the outcome against BYU.

"I thought we were pretty competitive and focused," Bietau said. "The general characteristics were pretty good."

Sophomore Maria Rosenberg led the Cats against BYU, winning her first match at No. 1 singles against the Cougars' Dominique Reynolds. Also picking up wins were Petra Sedlmajerova at No. 2 singles and Jessica Simosa at No. 3 singles. It was Simosa's first collegiate dual match.

K-State got its fourth point by taking the doubles match. Victories came from Simosa and Andrea Cooper at No. 1 doubles and Sedlmajerova and Paulina Castillejos at No. 2 doubles.

According to Bietau, the victory over the Cougars was a big one.

"The BYU match was an important match," Bietau said. "I don't think either of the coaches involved would want to say how important this match was before it started because it was the first match of the year.

"BYU is a team that hasn't been easy for us to win against, and that says something. They've also been a team that gets better as the year goes on so the value of the win continues to help us through the season."

Bonneville, Taylor next to play BirdHouse

By Scot Gammill
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

On Saturday evening, the BirdHouse concert series will be putting together a concert with bluesman Ray Bonneville and singer and songwriter Louise Taylor.

Bonneville said that playing for a crowd is something he really enjoys.

"I enjoy playing for people," Bonneville said.

"Performing is one thing that I enjoy a lot."

Bonneville's last CD, "Rough Luck," was released a couple of years ago, and his new album, "Roll It Down," is being released in a couple of months.

BirdHouse
Where: Manhattan Arts Center
When: 8 p.m. Saturday
Cost: $12 for students and senior citizens, $15 for general public. Tickets can be purchased at the Manhattan Arts Center, Claflin Books and Copy, and The Dusty Bookshelf.

Bonneville never has performed in Manhattan, but isn't new to Kansas.

"I've played shows in Abilene before," Bonneville said. "I'm really looking forward to my show in Manhattan. It should be a great experience and a good chance to meet new people."

Taylor has been receiving a lot of attention on the acoustic scene for her last CD, "Written In Red."

Her new release, "Velvet Town," is coming out March 11.

"Ray and I will both be playing close to an hour-long set," Taylor said.

This isn't Taylor's first time to Manhattan. She has done two shows for BirdHouse.

"The venue is a great place as far as acoustics go," Taylor said.

"It is very intimate. It holds enough people to be a big show, but is also small enough to get close enough to see everything."

These two acts were chosen to perform together because they have a history of making music together, Steve Martini, BirdHouse co-founder, said.

They have worked with each other on their music before and also have done many shows together.

"They play together a lot. They are a nice combination," Martini said. "They are both great performers, and we are real fortunate to have them come. It is something to look forward to."

Taylor said she enjoys playing shows with Bonneville because of their great past together.

"We're both great friends that enjoy and respect each others' music," Taylor said.

BirdHouse is in its eighth year of presenting shows at the Manhattan Arts Center. Every show the program presents is either sold out or close to being sold out.

"We have some hardcore fans that come to every show," David Kamerer, BirdHouse co-founder, said.

"There is usually close to 200 people at every show, which is something we are really pleased with."

THE PARENT TRAP

College mothers have less spare time, rarely get enough sleep

By Wendy Gorman
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

College students have it pretty easy.

Beyond 15 hours of class time and perhaps a few student organizations, most don't have an overwhelming number of commitments. Even having a job isn't necessary for all undergraduates.

This is not the case for all students. Though they are in the minority, there are students at K-State who have children. They are challenged to live a dual life: functioning as a student and as a parent as well.

Trisha Brinkley, freshman in open-option, operates on these two levels. She and her husband, Rob Brinkley, senior in marketing, attend school while raising their 10-month-old son, Paxton.

Trisha's typical day revolves around her son. She gets up in the morning to feed Paxton, then lets him play until her husband gets up, at which time she takes time to shower. She takes Rob to class at noon. He is almost finished with classes, so he is enrolled in more hours than Trisha.

"Rob's school is more important because he's about to graduate," she said.

In the afternoon, Trisha keeps an eye on Paxton while Rob has class and tries to get some of her own homework done.

"I'm only enrolled in six hours, and they are all Internet classes," Trisha said. "I don't go to school full-time since Rob is."

Rob and Trisha don't get time alone until about 9 p.m. Trisha said she doesn't plan on getting a full night's sleep.

"Most kids this age sleep through the night," she said. "Mine doesn't."

Trisha said her biggest challenge is going to school.

"I pulled a 4.0 last semester," she said, "but I had awesome teachers who were willing to work with me and help me get things done. With Paxton, it's really, really hard to study."

Other college mothers encounter similar hurdles. Sherrie Russell, co-owner of S & J Day Care, said she is familiar with the problems mothers face if they try to attend school.

"We have one client, a single mom, who is in college right now," she said. "Her biggest challenge is that she's trying to juggle class and a job, too. As a single parent, it's tough to make ends meet."

Russell said the Kansas Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services can be a helpful to young parents.

"I do like the SRS because they really try to help," she said. "They find ways to work with a parent. If the parent works a certain number of hours per week, the SRS will give them extra money."

Susy Toland, an early care and education specialist with the Flint Hills Child Care Resource and Referral Agency, said financial restrictions and scheduling difficulties are typical problems for college mothers.

"Their difficulties tend to revolve around the cost of childcare and availability of care that works around a fluctuating schedule," she said. "The typical avenues of childcare subsidy do not apply to those in college."

At the end of the day, the realities of raising a child remain.

"They want constant attention," Trisha said. "You can't just set them in a room and go do something else because they're going to cry."

Being a father while in college can be challenging, rewarding

By J. Scott Bowman
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Rob Brinkley generally goes to bed at 8:30 a.m. He doesn't crash in the early morning from partying all night, but because he has just returned home from his job and is taking a nap before his noon class.

Brinkley, senior in marketing, is one of few individuals who is receiving a special education – the lesson of fatherhood in college. Since his son was born 10 months ago, Brinkley has learned and grown more than what he thought he would, he said.

"I know that my priorities have changed since I've become a father," he said. "I think more about my future, and I try to learn as much at school as I can. I try to do better so that I can provide more for my wife and son."

Getting up at 3:30 a.m. for work, then having class for the rest of the day, as well as nurturing a child, can be difficult, Brinkley said.

He said that working together with his wife helps to balance his responsibilities.

"I know my wife takes most of the stress," he said. "But we love each other and work things out."

Stress can be one of the biggest problems with having a child at a young age, said Tony Jurich, professor of family studies and human services. He said transitioning from being a regular student to being a father can be hard.

"First, they have to deal with stuff that they may not normally know how to do," Jurich said. "Such as, he might be sitting there going 'OK, now I have to burp this child. I know it's not hard. I've seen a lot of people do it, but I have to figure out how exactly.'"

Jurich said that having a child at a young age also can be hard because most students are responsible only for themselves.

"The main thing is the kid has to take precedence over everything else," Jurich said. "It may not be hard to take an easy test, but to study with a kid screaming in the background can be very difficult.

"Another thing is, mothers will normally have the primary responsibility over the child. It's not really fair, but that is how it is, normally. A mom will often times get extra time on an assignment that a dad might not get."

Trisha Brinkley, freshman in open-option, and husband Rob Brinkley, senior in marketing, go grocery shopping for baby food and diapers with their 10-month-old son, Paxton.

To help alleviate the pressures of parenthood, an extra hand can be offered by the university, said Barbara Ferguson, director of the KSU Child Development Center. The center offers daycare services from 12 months to 12 years of age, she said.

"We offer full- and part-time care for students, staff members or alumni," Ferguson said. "Most of what we do is to help kids with developmental based play. A lot of the kids we care for have parents that are students."

Brinkley said his experience of being a father has been very rewarding, and he is happy with the way things have turned out.

"When I found out, I was happy, but sort of wary," he said.

"But, I've matured a lot and actually I'd recommend having kids at an early age. That way you can play with them more."

AOL | Time Warner loses $44.9 billion per share; Turner steps down

Turner told Parsons late Tuesday that he would step down, effective in May.

In the three months ending Dec. 31, AOL said Wednesday it lost $44.9 billion, or $10.04 per share, compared with a loss of $1.8 billion, or 41 cents per share, in the fourth quarter of 2001. Revenue rose 8 percent to $11.4 billion.

Not counting one-time items, AOL said it would have earned 28 cents per share. Analysts had predicted 26 cents per share.

The announcements were made after the markets closed. AOL stock closed higher, up 30 cents per share at $13.96 on the New York Stock Exchange. The stock dropped nearly 10 percent early in the extended session.

Executives said they expect 2003 revenue to grow "in the mid-single-digits" and pre-tax earnings to be flat.

Two years ago AOL and Time Warner announced their $106 billion merger, a crowning moment of the Internet boom. Since then the company has been forced to justify the mega-deal, overcome accounting questions and plot a turnaround.

The top executives who assembled the merger are gone, including America Online cofounder Steve Case, who announced his resignation as AOL Time Warner chairman this month.

The bright spot has been Time Warner's media properties, which include CNN, Warner Music, Time and People magazines, and the Warner Bros. film division that boasts blockbuster franchises like "Harry Potter" and "Lord of the Rings."

The weak link has been the AOL online division, which now hopes for a jolt from expanding high-speed Internet access and new music, information and shopping services.

AOL Time Warner this week sold its 8.4 percent stake in Hughes Electronics Corp., the parent company of the DirecTV satellite service. Analysts have speculated that AOL will make other cash-raising moves, such as selling its book-publishing division and the Atlanta Braves baseball franchise.

Parsons said he was pleased with the fourth-quarter performance and pledged to "run each of our businesses as well or better than before, with a continued major focus on stabilizing and revitalizing America Online."

The massive writedown disclosed Wednesday follows a $54 billion charge taken in the first quarter to account for the company's stock decline. At the time, it was the biggest quarterly loss in U.S. business history.

MERCY | County, hospital reach property agreement, avoid court ruling business to the extent that it was when the building was built in 1950.

In June 2001, the county decided to no longer pay for repairs or improvements on the property, which had been costing about $95,000 a year. When the county decided this, Mercy took full responsibility for the maintenance of the building. In addition, Mercy was working on an expansion project that was expected to cost $1.4 million.

Because of the excessive amounts they would be spending on the property, officials at Mercy couldn't justify leasing the property unless the Memorial Hospital Board of Trustees entered into a 10-year lease with them, said Derrick Roberson, a partner with Arthur-Green law firm who represented the Board of Trustees, which is elected, but not controlled by Riley County.

"The county became concerned that if there was a 10-year lease, that it might prevent them from selling the property, or prevent them from selling it at a fair value," Roberson said.

Roberson said the county requested to delay the lease until after the April 1 vote. The Board of Trustees decided not to delay the execution of the lease because to do so would hurt Mercy's plans, which included Lafene Health Center moving into the building on Sunset.

He said Mercy needed to start the expansion project by Feb. 3.

"If they didn't (start by then), there would be severe impacts, including losing their psychiatric department and would involve K-State's ability to move Lafene. My board decided not to do that," he said.

Riley County then obtained a restraining order to prevent the execution of the lease between the board of trustees and Mercy.

Roberson said the board of trustees filed a motion to vacate the restraining order so the lease could be executed, which would have been heard Wednesday.

However, because the county and Mercy reached an agreement, the motion didn't go before a judge.

"What we have now is better than that," he said. "Had we lifted the restraining order and executed the lease without the agreement, the county would still be worried about if they'd be able to sell the hospital for a fair price, and Mercy would be worried about if the county would sue them over that issue.

"The agreement resolves those issues and provides K-State a facility to move Lafene into. The county can sell for a fair price, and Mercy will be able to enjoy their investment and can ultimately make all the improvements they wanted to," Roberson said.

Morgan said citizens will benefit from the agreement by being able to obtain their health care locally, and also by being relieved of paying any taxes on the maintenance of the building.

"It's to the county's benefit to sell this building and get the revenue coming in to assist in lowering taxes," he said. "It seems to me both sides can accomplish what they want and citizens are benefiting in both ways."

CRUSH | Ames upset puts Wildcats into 3-way tie for conference lead

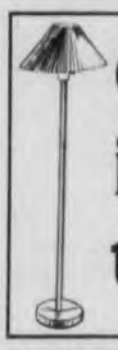
State its largest lead at 14 with a three-pointer at the 13:33 mark.

The Wildcats would get points on eight of their next nine possessions to pull within six at the 8:26 mark, but K-State ran into an offensive rut again during the next four minutes, as the Cyclones pushed the lead back to 11.



"The last couple minutes of the game we competed really hard and we had ourselves in position late in the game, but we had a couple key turnovers that weren't real smart that cost us," Wecker said.

With the loss, the Wildcats fall into a three-way tie for the conference lead with No. 8 Texas Tech, idle Wednesday night, and No. 13 Texas, which beat No. 18 Oklahoma 60-54 in Norman.

Sophomore Brie Madden, who battled through illness to score eight points, said the loss could play to K-State's benefit when the Cats visit the Sooners on Saturday.

"It can make you really hungry," she said. "The Big 12 is difficult. Road games are difficult. You just have to focus on your next opponent. You have to learn from your mistakes and apply them to every time you step on the court.

"Myself and my teammates are ready to lace it up tomorrow and go again."

ICE CREAM | Stores stay busy despite cold weather

"You get bored," she said. "We do homework and just kind of clean up the place more than when we were busier. Once, we had an employee that played basketball by throwing paper into cups, but a lot of girls work here, so we don't get too creative."

At Dairy Queen, where ice cream accounts for only a portion of the store's sales, there's no time for homework.

The store anticipates reductions in ice cream sales before the cold weather hits and adjusts its advertising to promote hot food items more during the winter.

"People don't want to come in and get ice cream when it's 5 degrees outside," said Robbie Russell, supervisor at Manhattan's east Dairy Queen.

Unlike Bittle, Russell said he's amazed when patrons come in looking for the cold stuff.

"I think they're crazy, personally," he said.

"It's funny when they come in shivering and want to order a Blizzard."

But at least one store is willing to accommodate.

"It's an all-American dessert, and we'll turn the heat up if that makes a difference," Bittle said.

"We can make it nice and toasty in here if they want."

ning or end of each semester. How many new students hired depends on how many graduated or left the previous semester.

The application process consists of filling out a form stating the applicant's interest in the job and qualities as an employee. Green then chooses five to six applicants to come in for an interview.

Students with work study are preferred, but work study is not required. Additionally, it is beneficial if students have previous modern language experience, but, again, is not required.

"There is no tutoring that goes on in the lab, but sometimes students will have simple questions that the employees can answer if they have experience with another language," Green said.

On average, the students work about seven to 10 hours per week, depending on work study and scheduling. Each employee earns minimum wage, making around $50 a week.

Courtney Keith, senior in social science, has been working in the lab for a year and a half. When Green informed her about the job, she decided to apply and was hired.

"I really enjoy working in the lab because I get to meet people from other majors that I would not meet otherwise," Keith said. "The best aspect is that it is an on-campus job and we are all students so everyone is very understanding of schedule conflicts and illnesses."

thought Lisa Kriener did a phenomenal job of not letting her catch it."

Ohlde was able to get 21 points in the contest, but K-State went down according to Iowa State's plan.

Ohlde said the Cyclones' defensive scheme was a good one, but added that K-State's mistakes helped Iowa State's cause.

"They came out really intense and really aggressive," Ohlde said.

"They were trying to D us up well, and they did that. But it was also us not being patient, getting to spots, and doing the things we're capable of doing."

Iowa State senior Lindsay Wilson, who went five for 22 from the field against the Cats two weeks ago in Manhattan, scored 27 against K-State on Wednesday.

Wilson said the pressure Iowa State was able to apply Wednesday night was born of flame.

"We just came out and had a lot of fire in us," Wilson said. "It was the first time in a while that it has felt like this. It's the feeling that everybody's into it. And that we're in it together."

8 European countries give support

U.S. backed by 7 prime ministers, 1 president in Iraq negotiations

By Pablo Gorondi
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

BUDAPEST, Hungary – Eight European leaders voiced deep gratitude to the United States on Thursday and wrote that U.S.-European ties "must not become a casualty" of Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein's attempts to "threaten world security."

In an indirect reference to opposition by France, Germany and Russia to U.S. plans to disarm Iraq militarily, the leaders of Britain, Spain, Italy, Portugal, Hungary, the Czech Republic, Poland and Denmark used an op-ed article to thank the United States for "bravery and generosity" in ensuring peace in Europe.

The article, signed by seven prime ministers and one president, was published in Thursday's editions of The Wall Street Journal's American, European and Asian editions, The Times of London and other European newspapers.

Karen Miller Pensiero, a Wall Street Journal spokeswoman, said the article originated with the newspaper's request to Italian Prime Minister Silvio Berlusconi and his Spanish counterpart, Jose Aznar, for the op-ed piece outlining their support for the U.S. position on Iraq.

She said the two leaders then contacted the other Europeans and sought their views, resulting in the opinion piece that carried all eight signatures.

In Washington, State Department spokesman Richard Boucher welcomed the statement. He called it "a clear, firm and unequivocal message" that Baghdad must be disarmed of its weapons of mass destruction. It also sent a message that the Security Council's credibility will suffer if resolutions are not complied with, Boucher said.

A spokesman for British Prime Minister Tony Blair was quick to dismiss suggestions Thursday that the article deepened a dispute between European nations and France and Germany, which staunchly oppose a war with Iraq if not sanctioned by the U.N. Security Council.

France and Germany "are in a slightly different place" on the Iraq debate, said the spokesman, who demanded anonymity. "They are, of course, entitled to their view."

Still, the article recalled U.S. Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld's recent, and controversial, characterization of France and Germany as representing an "old Europe" out of sync with the rest of the expanding European Union and NATO.

In his comments last week, Rumsfeld said the Cuts to affect city

Area services to see effects of fund shortage

By Crystal Becker
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

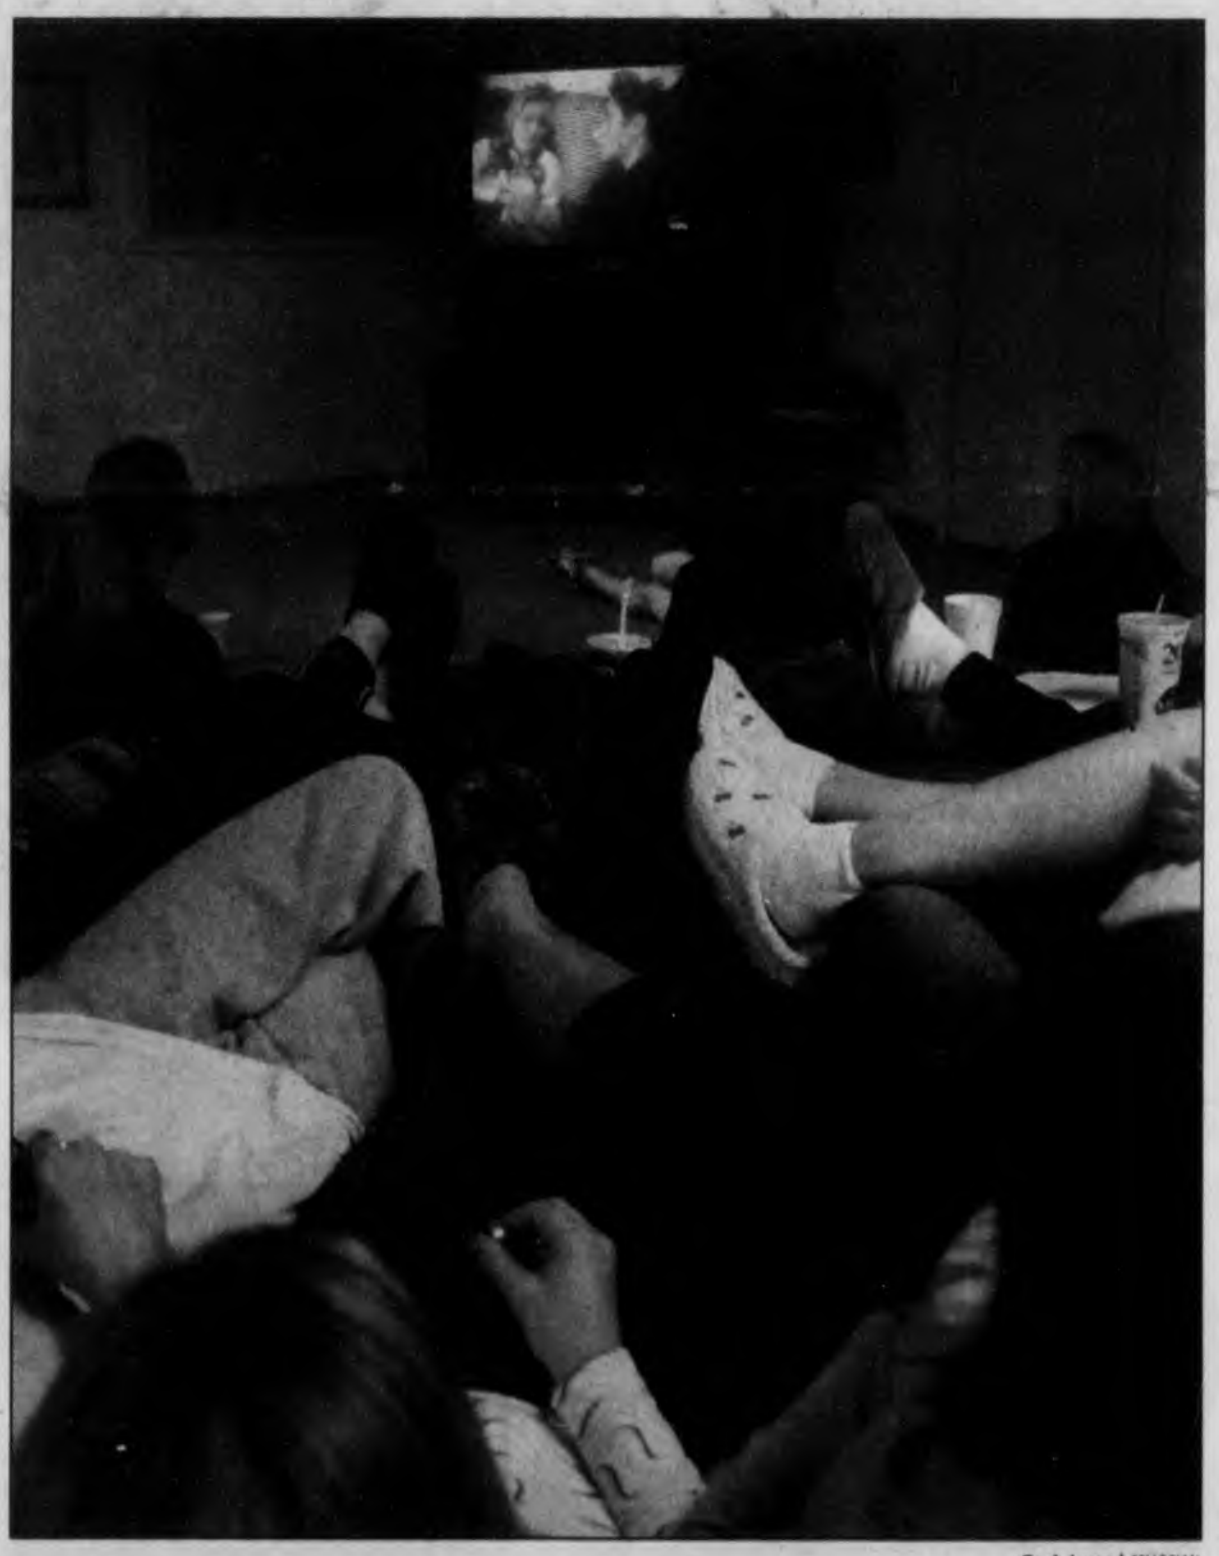
Manhattan residents may soon face additional city budget cuts this year after an $800,000 loss in state funding.

City Commissioners are discussing budget concerns after Gov. Kathleen Sebelius announced plans last week to halt all demand transfers from the state to city and county governments for 2003 and likely 2004. The Kansas Legislature must approve the budget before the cuts are made.

House members began debate Thursday on a budget that includes Sebelius' recommendations to withhold $48 million from cities and counties throughout the state.

Bernie Hayen, director of finance for the city, said although Manhattan ended last year with a surplus of $550,000, an $800,000-loss in state demand transfers and interest earnings will create a $350,000 deficit.

"Basically, if things continue as they are, we'll have to find a way to make up the deficit by December," Hayen said.



City Manager Ron Fehr said the commission can choose numerous ways to counter the loss, but it's too soon to make any decisions.

"The commission will spend the next few months analyzing the budget, especially as we move into March or April," Fehr said. "We'll wait to see what happens with the legislative process. If additional reductions are made, we may have to eliminate services or increase user fees, or both."

Hayen said commissioners will

Bill introduced to give more money to marching band

By Amy Preston
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

In an effort to improve funding for the K-State Marching Band, a bill to increase the university band's program privilege fee was introduced to legislation at Thursday night's Student Senate meeting.

Although the marching band performs at about 75 sporting events throughout the year, Frank Tracz, band director, said the group has the lowest operating budget in the Big 12.

With the bill, there would be about a 90-cent privilege fee increase per semester for each student, Travis Stryker, privilege fee chair, said.

"This increase gets them going," he said. "This is what (Tracz) asked for, and this is what we're giving them."

If passed, the annual privilege fee budget for the department would be $146,057 for the fiscal years 2004, 2005 and 2006.

Student Senate

The following items were discussed at the Student Senate meeting Thursday night:

- Christine Baker, Heath Starr, Kim Freed, Chad Bontrager, and Paul White were all sworn in as new Student Senators.
- Senate unanimously passed two Black Student Union and one Vietnamese Student Association allocations with a 54-0-0 vote.
- A bill to increase the university band's program privilege fee was introduced to legislation, along with an allocation for the K-State Women's Softball Club.

Students indulge in reality television

It's 8:25 Wednesday night, and the women of Gamma Phi Beta sorority are gathered around a big-screen television, packed on a long semi-circle couch, perched on overstuffed purple chairs or lounging on the floor.

Loud chatter, laughing, giggling and gossiping can be heard over the drone of a commercial.

Then silence falls with the sorority sisters' whispers of "Shhh! Shhh! Shhh!" as the feature presentation begins.

They are watching "The Bachelorette," ABC's reality TV series where one woman chooses from 25 men to find a potential husband. By tonight, she has narrowed it down to four men, and the women

Readers await 5th book in Potter series

By Jessica Packard
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Anticipation for the next Harry Potter book is almost at its peak.

"Harry Potter and the Order of the Phoenix," the fifth book in J.K. Rowling's series will be released June 21, but has already become the No. 1 preordered book on Amazon.com. It has also been in high demand in local booksellers.

Campus Connection

Many of the topics discussed at K-State are also discussed at America's other universities. Read each Friday about how K-State is connected to the rest of the nation

Adam Athavichitchanyaraks, Hastings Book, Music and Video guest service manager, said people are excited about the book because of the long wait.

"There's so much excitement since it was supposed to come out a year and a half ago," Athavichitchanyaraks, said.

With the book in such high demand, some booksellers have started having specials for those customers who pre-order.

Waldenbooks is offering 30 percent off to those who pre-order the book.

"We have had 210 copies reserved so far," Susan Larson, Waldenbooks assistant manager, said.

Larson said she is not surprised so many people have pre-ordered the Harry Potter book because so many different people like it.

"It doesn't matter what age you are – this book is for all ages," Larson said.

Lindsay Glatz, senior in public relations, said the Harry Potter books have brought her closer to her younger sister.

"I always get updates from my little sister about when it's coming out," Glatz said.

"It's definitely a way we have bonded."

Glatz's mother pre-ordered three copies of the fifth Harry Potter book for the family.

"We all want copies so that we can read it as soon as it comes out," Glatz said.

The Children's Bookstore in Aggieville will have a book release party for the fifth edition, like it has for the previous four.

Leigha Bolton, Children's Bookstore manager, said the party would be open to the public.

"We hosted a party for the last book release, and more than 100 people showed up with their kids," Bolton said. "It was a lot of fun."

Fans also can check the Harry Potter book out at the Manhattan Public library.

Jennifer Bergen, head of children and youth services, said the library would carry 15 to 20 copies.

Bergen said the library usually carries three to four copies of a popular children's book, but the demand for the Harry Potter series is high.

"It's very unusual to carry so many copies of a book and only have a few available at a time," Bergen said.

Pirtle said that even though there has been a wait, it is impressive to see a book release draw so much excitement.

"It's great to see the enthusiasm about a book release," Pirtle said.

"You haven't seen this much excitement about books in a long time."

Potter addicts keep sales brisk

By Bonni Ferguson
THE DAILY UNIVERSE

PROVO, Utah - Brigham Young University students are jumping on the pre-order purchasing bandwagon as they try to get their hands on J. K. Rowling's fifth Harry Potter book.

"I myself haven't pre-ordered it yet, but I'm planning on it," Jonathon Burgess, computer science major, said.

Aly Hosford, English major, also said she is considering pre-ordering.

"I really like how the story is going along, and I think J. K. Rowling has a lot of talent," Hosford said.

"Harry Potter and the Order of the Phoenix" is already No. 1 on the bestseller list on Amazon.com. The book continues to climb in ratings on other booklists, although it will not be released until June 21.

Janice Card, a children's book buyer at the BYU Bookstore, is not surprised.

Card said that in the past, Harry Potter book sales have been fast and furious.

"The publisher's pre-orders are maxed out," Burgess said. "Basically what is going to happen is that this book is going to be the best-selling book of all time."

Intense pre-ordering from online merchants may negatively affect bookstore sales around the country.

"We have competition all around us, and we can't order in billions of (Harry Potter) books, so we can't sell them as cheaply as other bookstores can," she said.

However, Card said she does not think the BYU Bookstore will suffer any loss of revenue.

"We'll still sell hundreds of (Harry Potter) books," she said.

Some students said pre-ordering is unfair to Harry Potter fans whose circumstances will not allow them to order early, like those people without access to the Internet.

Other students agree with publishers' decisions to offer pre-sale.

"I actually prefer pre-ordering," Burgess said.

"First of all, it's easy. Secondly, it gets delivered straight to you. It's very foolproof. Lastly, from a publisher's or author's point of view, publishers should have a great idea from the pre-orders how many books they should create."

Ami Hood, psychology major, said she can understand why Rowling's fifth book is already a bestseller before its release.

"I think that because kids always have such a great imagination, the residual effects of having those fantasies never quite goes away," Hood said.

"Harry Potter brings out that inner child and identifies with everybody."

Burgess compared the magnitude of Harry Potter's influence to earlier epics that have influenced American society.

"Harry Potter is in our day as 'Star Wars' was in 1978," Burgess said.

"It's our own personal myth that we're able to take to our own hearts."

Frederick A. Larson gives a presentation on the origin of the star of Bethlehem on Thursday at McCain Auditorium.

Biblical star discussed

By Kari Kennedy
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It is one of the great mysteries of science, Rick Larson said in his Star of Bethlehem Presentation last night in McCain Auditorium.

Larson, former lawyer and professor of law at Texas A&M University, shared his research of the skies to show evidence that the Star of Bethlehem was a real historic event.

The presentation, sponsored by the Lutheran Student Fellowship, highlighted the evidence of Larson's investigation.

He said some people view the star with the eyes of faith, or through skeptical eyes seeing it as a myth. Larson treats it as a mystery to be solved.

"I got interested in the star and started reading articles. I found an article that said the star was real," he said. "I thought, wouldn't it be cool if the star was real?"

Through a PowerPoint presentation, Larson showed evidence backed by excerpts from the Bible and used astronomical facts to support his theory.

Larson used clues for the 9 characteristics of the star, which are found in Bible passages, to help him find the exact star. He also used information from astronomical studies by Copernicus and Kepler.

"This is simply astonishing to me," he said "The sheer weight of imagery – it just blew me away."

Using a computer program, he showed the sky on the specific day of Christ's birth and used the information from the Bible and astronomy to show the audience the connections.

One student in attendance said she has deep faith and was interested in evidence that supported her beliefs.

"I wanted to learn more about the universe and that there are signs and evidence that God has a grand design," Jennifer Ward, sophomore in elementary education, said.

After 14 years of being a law professor, Larson took on this research project and now presents his theory all over the United States and the world.

"I was very impressed by Dr. Larson and his research," Ward said. "It is a very thorough study and very valid."

The presentation, which can also be seen at 7 tonight in McCain Auditorium, provided a religious and astronomical approach to his theory.

"This is just evidence I have shown you," Larson said. "It is up to you to decide."

Donations establish funds to recruit faculty, keep professors

By Kari Kennedy
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A combined donation of $2 million was given to K-State that will be used to create four Faculty of Distinction Chairs, which will serve as an incentive to keep distinguished professors at K-State or to recruit new faculty.

The donations were from K-State alumni Frank and Elizabeth Burke and Paul Danheim Nelson.

The Burkes donated $1.5 million to create the Daniel D. Burke Chair for Exceptional Faculty in the College of Business Administration, The Elizabeth Chapin Burke Chair in Human Ecology and the Richard A. and Greta Bauer Pickett Chair for Exceptional Faculty at K-State.

Joe Montgomery, communications writer for the KSU Foundation, said donating money for these chairs was a way for the Burkes to commemorate several of their family members and friends. They named each chair for a family member or close friends they had when they were students at K-State, he said.

"It's a real nice way for them to remember these individuals that were important in their lives," he said. "Future generations of faculty and students will learn about the Burke family."

Paul Danheim Nelson committed $500,000 for a professorship in the geology department.

"Since we have a small faculty, it allows us to expand and bring in someone who can add to the program," said Mary Hubbard, head of the Department of Geology.

The gifts can provide more than just a professorship for a department.

"In addition to salary, it can provide something a professor needs, like funding for research or a research associate," Provost James Coffman said.

He said the donated amount will be matched by the Kansas Partnership for Faculty Distinction Program.

"The total sum will be used to fund the salaries of distinguished professorships," Coffman said.

The Kansas Partnership for Faculty of Distinction Program was established by the Kansas Legislature in 2000 to encourage donations from private donors, according to the KSU Foundation Web site.

Montgomery said that at K-State the minimum donation to setup a faculty chair is $500,000. Within the Faculty of Distinction program, the state will attempt to match that amount, not dollar for dollar, but with supplementary funds, he said.

"Together, that makes a nice salary incentive to help recruit better faculty to K-State or to retain the better faculty members," he said.

This is not the first time for these donors to give money to the university. The Burkes have previously set up two other chairs, and Nelson established a scholarship fund a few years ago.

"It is a significant boost to faculty recruiting," Montgomery said. "It will be good in the future to have the opportunity to have the best faculty at the university."

Reid denounces U.S. government after being sentenced to life in prison

Bomber faces 60 years to life for attempted jetliner attack

By Denise Lavoie
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

BOSTON – Richard Reid, the self-described member of al-Qaeda, lashed out at the U.S. government Thursday before he was sentenced to life in prison for trying to blow up a trans-Atlantic jetliner with explosives hidden in his shoes.

Reid, a 29-year-old British citizen who converted to Islam eight years ago, angrily denounced American foreign policy against Islamic countries.

"Your government has sponsored the torture of Muslims in Iraq, and Turkey, and Jordan and Syria with their money and weapons," he said. He then told the judge, "it's in your hands."

Reid had faced 60 years to life in prison for trying to down the American Airlines flight bound from Paris to Miami a little more than a year ago.

Prosecutors said there was enough explosives in his shoes to blow a hole in the fuselage and kill all 197 people aboard.

Passengers and crew members overpowered Reid, using seat belts and their own belts to strap him to his seat. Two doctors who were passengers injected him with sedatives, and the flight was diverted to Boston.

When Reid pleaded guilty last October, he said he was a member of al-Qaeda, pledged his support to terrorist leader Osama bin Laden and declared himself an enemy of the United States.

"Basically I got on the plane with a bomb. Basically I tried to ignite it. Basically, yeah, I intended to damage the plane," Reid said that day with a laugh.

But defense lawyers said this week that he did not try to blow up the plane to wage war against America, but to defend Islam from attacks by the United States.

"He well knew that he would cause untold pain and grief even if only a few people were killed, but he says that this was outweighed in his mind by his firm belief ... that this country in recent years has caused the deaths of millions of Muslims," his lawyers wrote.

Reid's lawyers say Reid credits his religion with saving him from a life of drug use and despair. They describe a troubled childhood and young adulthood, when Reid was plagued by poverty, feelings of uselessness, racism and crime. Reid is the son of a British mother and a Jamaican father.

But in arguing for a life sentence, prosecutors earlier this month submitted a videotaped demonstration of what Reid might have accomplished, showing a fiery explosion causing massive damage aboard a wide-bodied jet.

Reid had tried furiously to light a match to his shoes but he was unable to ignite the fuse. Authorities have speculated Reid's shoes may have been too moist from sweat.

Three flight attendants struggled with Reid after they smelled sulfur from the matches. Attendant Hermis Moutardier told authorities Reid put a lit match in his mouth when she confronted him, then later tried to touch another match to the tongue of his sneaker.

Moutardier said she tried to grab the shoe, but Reid pushed her to the floor and she screamed for help. Attendant Carole Nelson said 75 to 100 passengers jumped up from their seats and headed for Reid when they saw him struggling with flight attendants.

"He was like a wild animal," Nelson testified last June. On Thursday, Nelson pleaded with the judge for a life sentence.

"I believe that Richard Reid was on a mission of evil, a mission of destruction and a mission of murder," she said. "Richard Reid put all of us on this flight under great stress and trauma."

Federal authorities had been preparing for a high-security trial. But Reid stunned prosecutors when he said he wanted to plead guilty to spare his family the pain and publicity a trial would bring.

In their sentencing memorandum, prosecutors called Reid "a committed terrorist who will remain so until his dying days."

"By his own words, Reid refuses to apologize for attempting to kill 200 people," U.S. Attorney Michael Sullivan wrote. "Perhaps even more appalling, he blames the American people for the horrendous attacks and casualties caused by the al-Qaeda terrorism organization to which he claims allegiance.

The FBI believes Reid had help making the bomb from "an al-Qaeda bomb maker," and authorities have said they found unidentified hair and a palm print on the explosives.

Reid was sentenced on eight charges: attempted use of a weapon of mass destruction, attempted homicide, placing an explosive device on an aircraft; attempted murder, two counts of interference with flight crew members and attendants, attempted destruction of aircraft, and using a destructive device during a crime of violence.

A ninth charge, attempted wrecking of a mass transportation vehicle, a charge filed under the new USA Patriot Act, was dismissed last summer.

OPINION

TO THE POINT

Alumni should be commended for donations

A recent $2 million donation will create four distinguished professorships or will be used to recruit more faculty.

In a time of financial crisis, alumni have stepped up and given programs like the College of Business Administration and the College of Human Ecology the opportunities to continue providing salaries to exceptional faculty members.

It is these alumni that make K-State's alumni base among the strongest in the nation. The money donated also helps uphold the integrity of K-State's growing research programs by providing funds for research associates or for the program itself.

With the approaching fiscal year, K-State continues to struggle financially, forcing even more tuition increases. Additionally, faculty salaries remain a problem on campus.

It is difficult to retain quality professors at K-State if the funding is not there. Various departments and colleges across campuses have issued hiring freezes throughout the past two years, tightening the grip even more on staff hirings and salary increases.

A financially drained institution cannot operate effective research programs if the staffing is not there.

By having dedicated alumni, the university is able to stay strong in a time of financial instability. Regardless of how the money is spent – whether it goes to help recruit new faculty members or to distinguished professorships – the university and its respective colleges and departments will reap the benefits.

The financial outlook of the university is still unclear, but the donations from former students and to the KSU Foundation will help keep the ship afloat while the state of Kansas and the university wade through the poor financial situation.

We commend these alumni for their continued devotion to the university and specifically to maintaining a credible, well-paid faculty base.

With their continued support, K-State will continue to provide its students with a respectable educational experience.

To the point is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

WHAT IF?

Black History Month an opportunity to learn about, reflect on inventions

ANGEL WILSON

In light of Black History Month, I'd like to share a story with you.

Theo woke up one morning and asked God, "What if there were no black people?" God thought about that for a minute and said, "Follow me around today and we'll see."

Theo ran to his room to put his clothes and shoes on, but there were no shoes and his clothes were all wrinkled. When he reached for the ironing board, it was no longer there. Sarah Boone invented the ironing board and Jan Matzelinger invented the shoe-lasting machine.

"Go do your hair," God said. Theo tried to comb his hair, but the comb wasn't there. Walter Sammons invented it. He decided to just brush his hair, but the brush was gone too. Lydia Newman invented that. No shoes, wrinkled clothes, hair a mess without the hair-care inventions of Madam C.J. Walker. What a sight!

"Let's do the chores around the house and go to the store," God said. Theo was to sweep the floor, but when he reached for the dustpan it wasn't there. Lloyd Ray invented it. So he left the pile of dirt. He tried to mop the floor, but the mop was gone, too. Thomas Stewart invented that.

Since Theo wasn't having any luck, God suggested he wash his clothes and prepare a grocery list. Afterwards, Theo went to place the clothes in the dryer, but it wasn't there. George Samon invented it.

Theo got a pencil and some paper to prepare the grocery list, but noticed the pencil wasn't sharp. Too bad, because John Love invented the pencil sharpener. He reached for a pen, but it wasn't there because William Purvis invented it. They went to the market anyway.

When they got to the car, it wouldn't go. Robert Spikes invented the automatic gearshift, and Joseph Gammel invented the supercharge system for internal combustion engines.

The few cars that were moving were running into each other without Garrett Morgan's traffic light. It was late, so they hurried to the store, got their groceries and went home. As they were about to put away the milk, eggs and butter, they noticed the refrigerator was gone. John Standard invented it.

By this time, it was getting cold. Theo went to turn up the heat, but was disappointed. Alive Parker invented the heating furnace. Even in the summer they would have been out of luck because Frederick Jones invented the air conditioner.

It was almost time for Theo's father to arrive home. He usually took the bus, but there wasn't one because its precursor was the electric trolley, invented by Elbert Robinson.

He usually took the elevator from his office on the 20th floor, but there wasn't one because Alexander Miles invented it. He usually dropped the office mail at a nearby mailbox, but it wasn't there because Phillip Downing invented the letter drop mailbox, and William Barry invented the postmarking and canceling machine.

Dejected, Theo sat by himself. When his father arrived, he asked why he was sitting in the dark. Probably because Lewis Howard Latimer invented the light bulb filament.

Not to mention if he were sick and needed blood, Charles Drew found a way to preserve and store blood, which led to him starting the first blood bank. And what if a family member needed surgery? It wouldn't have been possible without Daniel Hale Williams, who performed the first open-heart surgery.

Theo quickly learned what the world would be like without black people.

What did you learn?

Popular computer teaching methods devoid of real education potential

ANDREW LAWSON

For those of you who despise K-State Online, I have a frightening vision for you.

Imagine K-State as a collection of computer labs, where your professors are computer programs and corporate values have eliminated any shred of interpersonal contact in education.

Scary, huh? It may not be too far in the future.

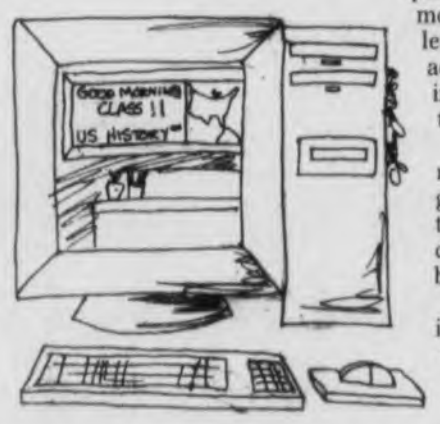
The digital galleon is sailing unhindered, and universities, like other proud institutions of the past, are being caught in its wake. Left adrift, they must decide how to adapt to a new information age.

Many presidents and chancellors are adopting a business model to cope. Unfortunately, these cut-throat practices are not conducive to effective learning.

The most disturbing practice in the business world is the increasing reliance on technology. In education, the equivalents are distance learning, online education, e-mail discussion lists and other such initiatives.

"Institutions of higher education have been equally driven by a perceived need to keep up, in place of any deliberatively generated vision of what education should achieve," said Hank Bromley, assistant professor at the State University of New York at Buffalo.

When technology becomes the focus, the actual material taught suffers.



"Define your needs, then look for a [technology]," Bromley said. "While this bit of advice ought to be obvious and unnecessary, the practice described is not at all common.

"Rather than starting with what we want to accomplish, and then examining how technology might be used to achieve these goals, we more often approach our computer decisions with the attitude: 'This technology exists; we've got to have it.' The result: Educational computing is largely technology-driven rather than curriculum-driven."

Managing these new technological mandates cuts into the time of professors, which further damages the educational process.

"Faculty certainly are pressured to be more responsive to administrators and students at all times of day and night, from e-mail," said Richard Sclove, founder and director of the Loka Institute.

"Faculty are told, 'we're not reducing any other aspect of your professorial responsibilities. You still have to be on committees. You still have to be in the classroom. You still better publish plenty. But, by the way, you also have to now be accessible to students and administrators and colleagues on e-mail.' Who created the three extra hours in the day where you're supposed to be able to do that?"

Meanwhile, online learning is gaining popularity as an alternative to crowded lecture halls, but at what cost?

Sclove said, "The most important professors and teachers for me were effective much more because of their emotional excitement and how they conveyed it, and the emotional bonding they had with students, and not simply because of their intellectual knowledge.

"The professors were creating an exciting, emotionally engaged learning experience – that exchange has got to be face-to-face. I'll be surprised if we don't find that a move towards more online learning means a loss of those admirable special and exciting qualities of a good education."

And isn't it convenient that online learning gives universities an alternative method of teaching students when all the professors burn out and retire?

When the bottom line is the driving force, then universities eventually will only care about filling their labs with students, milking them for tuition money to stay competitive and build more computer labs.

It may be a far-fetched prediction of doom now, but we're heading in that direction. The time to stop it is now.

Bush: war in 'weeks not months'

By Jennifer Loven
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON – President Bush, moving toward a decision on war with Iraq, said Thursday he will give diplomacy "weeks not months" and said the United States would welcome Saddam Hussein going into exile.

"For the sake of peace, this issue must be resolved," the president said amid intensified administration efforts to increase pressure on reluctant U.S. allies to disarm Saddam.

From Capitol Hill to public appearances elsewhere in Washington, key administration figures kept up the war of words against the Iraqi leader even as one ally – Canada – objected to any unilateral action by the United States. Pakistan's foreign minister told Bush his country preferred any military action be carried out through the United Nations and that war would trigger a reaction from the Islamic world.

Bush met with Italian Premier Silvio Berlusconi, a firm supporter of the United States' hardline position toward Iraq. In an Oval Office session with the Italian leader, Bush put allies on notice that he will not wait long to act against Saddam, even if the United Nations refuses to back his actions.

"This is a matter of weeks not months," Bush said.

The British and Italians are among Bush's staunchest supporters while a number of other U.S. allies, including France and Germany, want to give U.N. weapons inspectors more time in Iraq.

Bush met later with Saudi Arabia's foreign minister, who is trying to rally nations behind a plan to offer Saddam exile. Bush said he was open to the idea.

"Should he choose to leave the country, along with other henchmen who have tortured ... Iraqi people, we will welcome that, of course," Bush said. He said, however, that the U.S. would continue to insist that Iraq disarm, regardless of who governs the nation.

Saudi Foreign Minister Prince Saud al-Faisal told reporters outside the White House that he had not spoken to Bush about exile, though other Saudi officials said he was in Washington to discuss amnesty for Saddam.

Saudi Arabia's ambassador to the United States, Prince Bandar, also said exile did not come up. Saudi officials do not believe exile is possible, in part because other Iraqi senior leadership would not allow it, he said.

Pakistani Foreign Minister Khursheed Kasuri also told Bush that his country preferred any military action be through the United Nations.

He warned Bush that "there will be a reaction to the events in Iraq and I want our friends in the United States to be mindful of those."

Bush also talked to Jose Manuel Durao Barroso, the Portuguese prime minister, and to Swedish Prime Minister Goeran Persson.

Meanwhile, Canada cautioned the United States against acting alone against Iraq.

"If one state acts by itself it risks consequences," said Bill Graham, the foreign minister of Canada.

Graham also met with Secretary of State Colin Powell.

Iraq invites inspectors to Baghdad

By Charles J. Hanley
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

BAGHDAD, Iraq – Iraq invited the chief U.N. inspectors back to Baghdad on Thursday for more talks on ways to verify Iraqi disarmament and deflect charges that Saddam Hussein's government is not cooperating fully with them.

Meanwhile, two more Iraqi experts refused to grant secret interviews to U.N. investigators in the hunt for Iraq's alleged weapons of mass destruction.

Presidential adviser Amer al-Saadi asked Hans Blix and Mohamed ElBaradei to return in advance of their next crucial report to the U.N. Security Council on Feb. 14. The U.N. officials conducted two days of talks with Iraqi officials here on Jan. 19-20.

Blix and ElBaradei's spokesman said they hadn't received formal invitations and wouldn't comment on it until then.

Their inspection teams on Thursday took a step toward long-term monitoring in Iraq, installing the first equipment to sample the air for clues to banned weapons work.

Talk of a war that would short-circuit those plans dominated top-level meetings in Washington.

In an Oval Office session with Italian Premier Silvio Berlusconi, President Bush warned that he will not wait long to act against Saddam, even if the United Nations refuses to back his actions.

The U.S. and British governments say they will take action against Baghdad if, in their view, it fails to disarm under U.N. resolutions prohibiting the Iraqis from engaging in chemical, biological and nuclear weapons programs.

Such a U.S. offensive against Iraq might leave a huge number of civilian casualties, a 16-member team of American humanitarian specialists said in Baghdad after completing a 10-day survey throughout Iraq.

They cited a confidential U.N. document projecting a worst-case scenario of up to 500,000 Iraqis killed, wounded or stricken by disease, particularly if U.S. bombs target Iraq's electricity grid, crippling water, sanitation, public health and food distribution systems.

The disruption of water and sewage systems after the Americans bombed the power grid in the 1991 Gulf War was blamed for thousands of subsequent deaths by disease.

Care a must with OU

Players will need to stay within talents

BEN FEHR

My eighth-grade basketball coach once made an example of me at a practice while explaining why we hadn't won a game that season.

"One of the biggest mistakes a player can make is to play outside himself," Coach Hansard said. "Ben Fehr is a player who comes to mind when you talk about somebody trying to do too much. If you are going to pass the ball behind your back, you need to have a reason. It's not just about the show."

While I would eventually leave organized basketball, Hansard's lesson stuck with me.

That lesson can be applied to both K-State basketball teams on Saturday.

Both teams are going to have to stay within themselves to have success.

For the women, it will be important for players to execute Coach Deb Patterson's offense while dealing with another loss – that of Laurie Koehn.

Part of the reason K-State was stagnant against Iowa State was Koehn's absence.

Another was Kendra Wecker being on the bench by the 11:00 mark of the first half after picking up three fouls.

With Wecker and standout Nicole Ohlde in the game, K-State is a dangerous team.

But without them, the Cats struggle to find ways to score.

Patterson's group, minus Koehn, will have to learn to score without both Ohlde and Wecker to be successful against the the merciless Big 12.

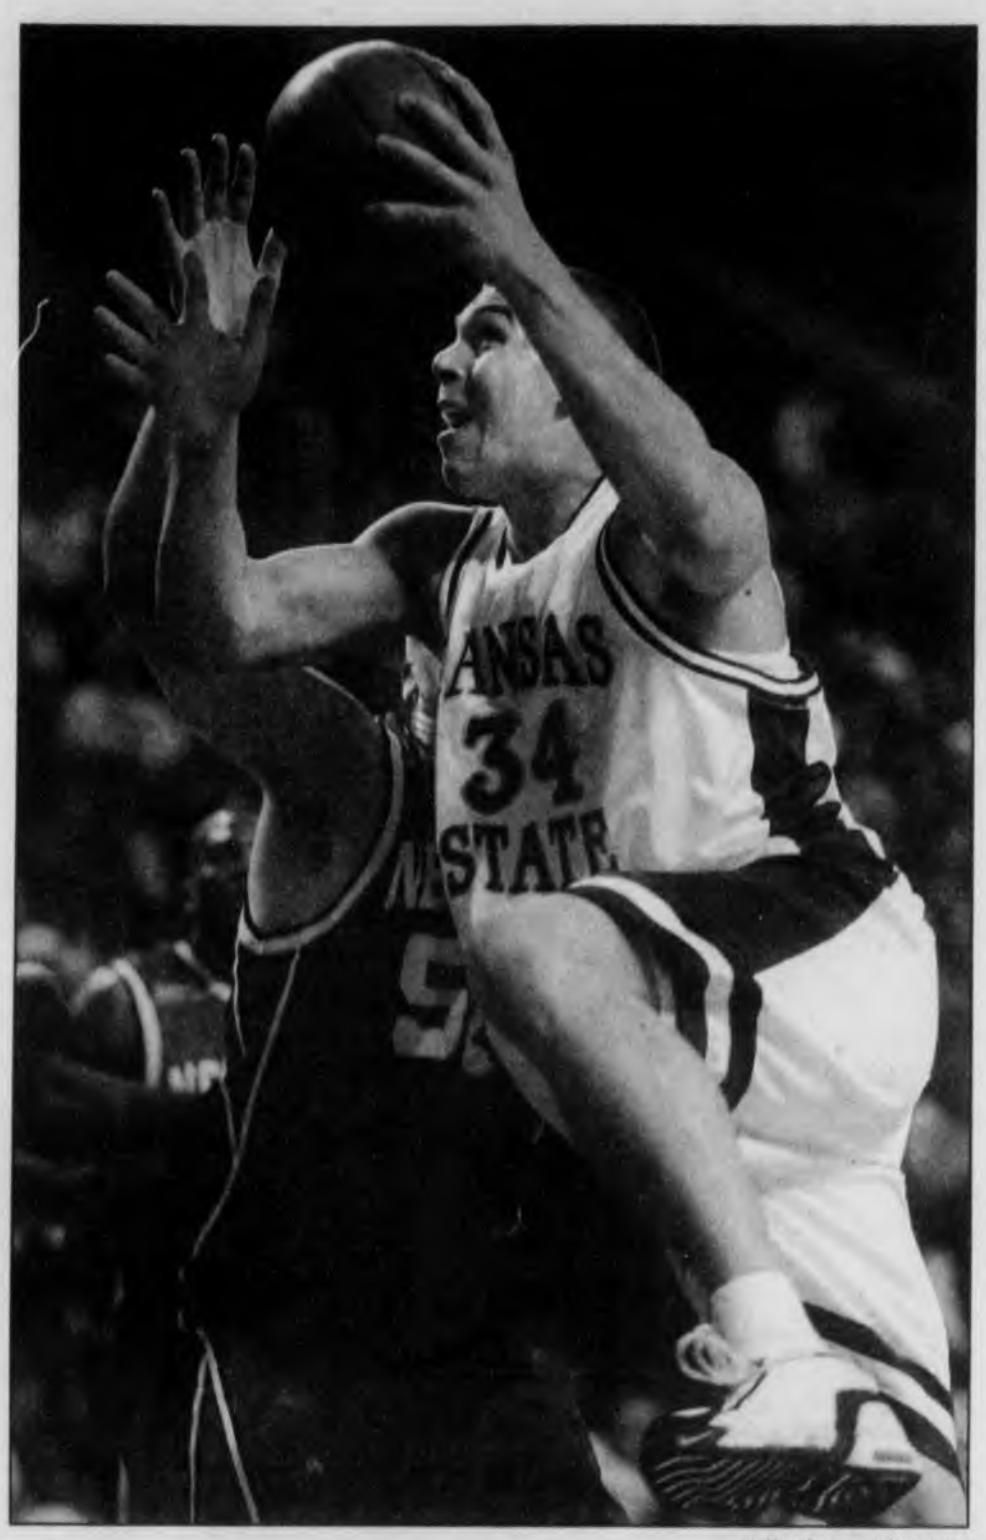
That means execution on offense, intensity on defense, and it means K-State's role players must believe they can compete.

That will take K-State's players staying within themselves.

The men are a classic example of a team that depends on execution to get points.

K-State isn't deep off the bench, and that showed in their latest loss to Texas A&M.

But K-State has the capacity to score. Three players average double figures, and K-State will need all three to have big games to compete.



The Sooners are talented and deep. Oklahoma will pressure K-State with a stifling defense and try to get the Cats to play a run-and-gun game.

K-State has played Oklahoma tough in recent meetings, particularly in Bramlage,

Gilson DeJesus said there are few teams in the country that can match Oklahoma in the defensive and rebounding aspects of the game.

So far this season that statement has held true in Big 12 contests.

K-State, however, proved last year they can be one of those teams – they did it for nearly 32 minutes in each game.

But it will take a full 40 minutes if the Wildcats hope to reach the .500 mark in league play Saturday against the sixth-ranked Sooners, DeJesus said.

"They play hard defense, they rebound the ball – they're just intense," he said. "They're the best rebounding team I have seen. So we'll have to go for 40 minutes."

K-State faced Oklahoma twice last year. The first matchup came in Norman, Okla., a 73-62 defeat, while the other was during the second round of the Big 12 tournament, another Cat loss, 63-52.

One trend was similar in both games – K-State was competing with the top-10 team at halftime.

But on both occasions, the Sooners were able to sustain a run of nine or 10 points, putting the Wildcats to bed for good.

That will have to change if K-State hopes to win Saturday, Coach Jim Wooldridge said.

"That is one of our biggest challenges," he said. "Can we put together consecutive minutes and sustain our effort for long periods of time?

"The bottom line with these guys is you have to sustain an effort for 40 minutes in order to be successful," he said. "And that's in all phases – rebounding, taking care of the ball,

Key stat: The Wildcats enter shooting 50 percent from the field on the year. The Sooners are connecting at a 42-percent rate.

As identity crises go, K-State's women might be struggling with their worst one in a while.

With sharpshooter Laurie Koehn questionable again for Saturday's contest against No. 18 Oklahoma with a sore right ankle, the No. 3 Wildcats are a team looking for answers, Coach Deb Patterson said.

"At this point, it's so hard to picture the team we are today as the team we were in the preseason and early in the conference season because we haven't really been on the road," Patterson said, "and where we've had success, we've had Laurie Koehn."

Without Koehn patrolling the perimeter Wednesday night, unranked Iowa State put the wraps on K-State's offense and dealt the Cats their first loss of the conference slate, 74-69.

"Last night was kind of hard after the game just coming home and stuff," sophomore Kendra Wecker said Thursday, "but you can't dwell on the loss and pout about it."

K-State's first chance to right the ship comes Saturday against the Sooners. The quick turnaround could be just the medicine the Cats are looking for.

"To take an early loss in
